JOHN STARK'S ORATION

heaven now, enjoying his reward, and about thirty-five or forty of us free Americans are enjoying "prosperity." The ruling class has never cringed at repudiating debts incurred or titles given whenever it suited their convenience to do so. At the present time several hundred millions are repudiated every year thru bankruptcy proceedings and without that formality. While it is impossible to even guess the amount that has been repudiated in the last century perhaps more than what debts are now legally held. I have no reference books which deal with that question but am under the impression that all the debts in the southern states, public and private, were repudiated by statute after the rebellion. History is said to repeat itself. I will summarize this idea from ancient history in the course of these contributions also a working plan which I know the grange will not endorse and perhaps no one else believes in at present writing, but before I am thru I shall not be alone on this question.

Clearly it is none of my personal affairs whatever funny stunts are pulled off in the grange. On the other hand this body presumes to speak for an industrial group, of which I am a member, and proposes legislation which will effect us all alike, theoretically speaking at least. So also then their lodge performance must have some influence over me if the legislation proposed should succeed in being brot about. Some forty odd years ago the grange was young and vigorous and while not revolutionary in character there was a radical sentiment among them so that the farmer became alarmed and the grange was warmly hated. Since then it has become "respectable" by the lawyer political bums, and many of our "best people" going in and operating the steering gear. Consequently there is so much stress laid upon non-essentials. In my infancy it was customary for busy mothers to smear a little molasses on baby's hands when the youngster became annoying then by giving it a few feathers baby became interested and mamma could turn her attention to important affairs. The same thing is being done in not only the grange but other societies of supposed working-class affairs. The masters of the grange furnish the masters in the grange enough molasses and feathers to keep these organizations "safe and sane," that is, harmless.

Your comparing me to Lincoln's steam boat is very good, speed is not the only thing to be considered. A tug and barge on the Willamette hauling wood is of more use to humanity than the swiftest battleship afloat and a life buoy anchored at a rock is of greater service to mankind than all the navies of the world. To me it seems the master of the ship has lost his chart or has been bought to run the ship on the rocks so I am blowing my fog-horn to arouse the crew and passengers to go to their life belts for there is going to be a wreck. I am aware the masters are annoyed by my continual blowing, but I propose to keep at it so long as life's steam holds out.

You say I demand fundamental changes. Yes, I refuse to furnish any more thread to sew new patches on the worn-out garment. I demand REVOLUTION. The reasons I need not give; every daily newspaper is full of them to those whose eyes see. Every court house is full of proof. Follow any road throughout the country and the anxious faces you meet furnish proof. By the side of the road stands the proof in the tumble down shacks that are by custom and courtesy called homes, just as we habitually do in regard the shelter where these lines are written. But every time some one starts to make a holler the masters come around with a little molasses and feathers, and if that doesn't keep us quiet then some other stunt is pulled off.

You are a believer in "capital." Just what you understand by that term is not clear. Perhaps it is like "Brooklyn-facel Joe," who was arrested "on suspicion." Nothing was found but a "blackjack," which the police took away from him. Brooklyn told a pal that he "was going to engage in business in this old town, but the cop confiscated my capital." It enables me to accumulate a surplus in their productive years to support them in old age, you say. It does nothing of the kind, for the majority of men. You support interest and rent ideas because the old and infirm have a means of life. If it was a rule of society that all the vigorous should care for the aged and infirm through interest and rent I should cheerfully endorse that plan, unless a simpler one could be devised. That is, however, not the proposition under capitalism. Many times have I seen a husky young man or woman riding on the ragged bent back of the

An Episode Of the Russian Revolution

By WILLARD BLAKEMAN

A meeting of a revolutionary committee broke up in Petrograd, and the members went out one-sometimes two-at a time in order that they should not attract the attention of the police. A couple emerging from the building went together down the street.

"Peter," said one to the other in an undertone.

"What is it, Ivan?"

"We have a traitor among us, a spy of the government, who has joined our circle to betray us."

"Heavens! What can we do to circumvent him?"

"It will be impossible without making sacrifices. I am going to the chief of police to denounce him as a traitor to the government, one who pretends to serve it while betraying its secrets to the circle. But I will not be believed unless I betray several of our members at the same time."

"But they will be sent to Siberia."

"We must contrive to get them off before they go, and if that is impossible we must attempt a rescue."

"A rescue! Impossible!"

"We shall see."

Ivan Demizorf the next day was closeted with the chief of police. He named four men who were plotting against the government, including the spy, and recommended that they be confined in a room on the top story of a certain building, a window of which could be seen from windows on the opposite side of the street. "Other conspirators," he added, "will learn where they are, will communicate with them and can be arrested." The chief assented to the plan, the arrests were made, and the prisoners were confined as suggested.

Spies were set to watch the opposite side of the street, and if any one was seen making signs to the prisoners the police were to be informed. The men were held several days, but no one was seen to be communicating. Not only did the spies become tired of watching and consequently careless, but those guarding the prisoners relaxed their vigilance. It was hoped that they would all go to sleep at the same time, but they did not. Finally Ivan Demizorf confessed to the chief of police that his plan was a failure, but it was agreed to leave the prisoners where they were one day longer. If at the end of twenty-four hours no other fish were hooked the four men were to be sent to Siberia.

That night at 8 o'clock a man of dark complexion, wearing a red fez, was seen to enter the building where the prisoners were confined. About half past 8 a woman with a long stride went in; later a negro and still later a man in Montenegro costume. The last of these persons passed in at 10 o'clock, and none of them were seen to pass out.

In the morning when the relief guard went to the building they found the door of the room where the prisoners had been placed locked. They called and were answered by the guard within and told to break down the door. They did so and found the guard bound and gagged, while the prisoners were gone. They told the relief that during the previous evening they were set upon by a number of men dressed in different costumes, who had succeeded in snatching their guns, had overpowered them and taken away the prisoners.

The man who wore the fez, first entering the building, was Ivan Demizorf, the others were members of the circle of which he was a member. They concealed themselves in different parts of the building, and near midnight the negro, who was so black that he could not be distinguished in the darkness, crept up to the top story, where the prisoners were confined, and, peeping, saw that of the four men composing the guard at the door three were sound asleep, and the other was dozing. Returning, he reported what he had seen, and the rescue party, headed by Ivan Demizorf, crawled up the staircase. On reaching the top Demizorf awaited his opportunity, then made a dash for the gun of the man who was nodding.

One of the other men of the rescue party got the gun of a man who was asleep without encountering any resistance, but the two remaining rescuers were obliged to fight for the other weapons. However, it was not a minute before every guard was covered by a gun in the hands of a rescuer.

Demizorf opened the door where the prisoners were confined and found them all awake and intensely interested in what had been going on outside. There were now double the number opposing the guards, and their guns had been taken from them. Ropes and gags had been brought, and the first thing done was the insertion of the latter. Then the guards were bound, laid on the floor, the door locked, and the rescue party departed with the prisoners.

The three bona fide members of the circle made their escape across the border. One remained in Germany; the two others went to America. Demizorf did not dare face a suspicion of having had a hand in the rescue, though he had been well disguised, so he made off for parts unknown. He turned up in the United States, where he became a head center for an association of exiles who plotted to aid their fellow workers in Russia.

The fourth man who was rescued was never heard from after his rescue. It is supposed that he suffered for his treachery before the party separated.

aged veteran in the army of the workers. How often do we read where someone had a surplus, but as soon as the mind lost its vigor with increasing years was dispossessed by kin or one other cunning crook under forms of law.

"A farm should be owned by the man who has made it" is one of your masterly opinions. Just where does a man stand when he is "making a farm?" In this locality, so far as I have seen, even grangers need land to stand on while "making a farm."

Of course who made the land is out of the question. Most likely the S. P. R. R.

One of my hobbies is that no one not using land has any right to prevent any one else from using it. If our government was not in the hands of traitors to the American people no foreigner could own an inch of American soil. No Lord Scully could own a whole county of Illinois. But these "fat bellies with good capon lined" will bellow about "our flag," but sell our birthright to the foreigner against whom they pretend to build navies and maintain big armies. Yes, and the workers fall for this swindle, therefore I am blowing my fog horn, much to the annoyance of the little, very little, masters.

To wipe out debts and to keep them wiped out you declare to be "some dream." To continue these ever increasing debts is grown into a life-sized nightmare that is even worrying the "worthy masters" in the grange so they propose to bind them on tighter for "say 50 to 100 years."

But these debts will be wiped out one of these days just as it was done thousands of years ago and no honest person will be the loser—the whole world will be the gainer.

I do not contend that there is any moral difference between the lender and borrower. Both are worthy to the crime. Many a lender would gladly give up the scheme, but as society is now organized the rule is, "exploit or be exploited." No one can be blamed for seeking the greatest results from life.

The rules of the game are wrong and must and will be changed. The war in Europe is a direct result of this evil system. Possibly it will help to break it up, even though it was commenced for the purpose to perpetuate it, like the rebellion was caused by chattel slavery, and itself caused its downfall. Men act according to their environments. Change the environments and results follow. Profit is another scheme for exploitation. It must be clear, even to a master, that we cannot all have a profit any more than we can all take interest or rent. The main question I wish to deal with is the "rural credit" scheme. The fundamental proposition I bring up is that no artificial handicaps shall be placed upon production. That, of course, is REVOLUTION!

JOHN F. STARK.

FINE STUFF, THIS

Good for Candy, Lame Horses, or for Use in Laboratory

Bentonite is a kind of clay which has a variety of uses. It is employed to give body and weight to paper, in the preparation of a dressing for inflamed hoofs of horses, as a constituent of antiphotogenic, a proprietary remedial dressing, and as an adulterant of candies and drugs. It has notable powers of absorption, taking up about seven times its own volume of water. It absorbs twice as much glycerine as can be absorbed by diatomaceous earth, and for this reason has been suggested as a substitute for that material in the manufacture of dynamite. Monday afternoon of this week Chief of Police Shaw was host to a small and select party of newspapermen and poured "cold tea." The Chief also poured warm beer—but not into his guests, both of whom push lead pencils on duly authenticated "dry" papers.

The occasion was the confiscation of the stock of beer and liquor seized last week when six gay and festive farmers were arrested for dragging booze through the city, and for drinking it in front of the courthouse. The Chief poured into the jail sink something like two gallons of whiskey and over-well, over the 24 quarts of beer allowed individual consumers under the Jones' anti-booze law. Combined Filter and Pump Now Available for Outings

By the invention of a filter pump one of the most serious inconveniences encountered by motorists and sportsmen, that of obtaining pure drinking water in sparsely settled districts during hot weather, is obviated materially, says the September Popular Mechanics Magazine, in an illustrated article. With this device clear water may be drawn from any lake or running stream and with greater safety than can be taken in the usual manner from shallow wells.

The pump is made compactly and may be added to the equipment of a motor-car, lichenette cabinet or carried by a hunter in a haversack. The lower end of the intake pipe is covered with a fine-mesh strainer. The water is drawn through this by the upstroke of the piston, and on the downstroke is forced into a chamber containing the filtering agent, which consists of infusorial earth mixed with a binding material. From this cylinder it is discharged through a nozzle. Fixed to the device is a supporting leg which, when set on the bank of a stream, allows the operator to stand nearly erect while drawing water.
