ON THROWING MUD

Jonathan Bourne and his associates who control the chief tainted news bureau of the standpat republican outfit in the East are not so greatly to be blamed for the variety of "dope" they are shooting to the country press regarding the Wilson administration. Their "information bureau" was designed openly to find fault with everything democratic, to malign all democrats in office and generally to cast all the discredit possible upon President Wilson's official family. Brother Jonathan conceived the idea as a political move, and such money as he has been able to control has been used to hire press-agents to carry out the idea.

This is all according to Hoyle, and it is part of a game of politics. So, in the recent statewide prohibition fight, both the wets and the dries maintained expensive press bureaus, which sent to the papers of the state matter favoring the cause in which they were paid to work. And nobody objected—it was all part of the fight. However, in the prohibition campaign many of the Oregon papers showed that they had something in their policy that was above the dollar. Some of them believed prohibition was not the thing, and they refused to print the matter sent out by the Committee of One Hundred, even when Orton Goodwin, the eminent British press-agent, offered to pay for it. Other papers, believing that a continuation of the liquor trade was harmful, refused to print the matter sent out by the bright young men who were employed by the National Brewers' Association under various aliases. They wouldn't print it even when cash was sent in advance.

Some newspapers, you see, have consciences. Some newspapers are run by men who think there are limits to the things that they ought to do for money.

So it is with the efforts of Jonathan Bourne's campaign committee to discredit the Wilson administration. Jonathan Bourne has the right of every campaigner to send out such matter as he is willing to be the official father of. And the newspapers have the privilege of printing it, or of refusing to print it. A great many republican papers, believing that this is a time of national stress, a time when the country should stand behind the president, have refused to print the Bourne matter. Some big republican papers have even gone so far in their patriotism as to declare editorially that the republican party will make a grave error if it opposes in any way the re-election of President Wilson should the European war continue through 1916. Leading this list of truly patriotic republican newspapers is the New York Tribune, probably the most steadfast republican daily in the United States. All of Jonathan Bourne's money, or all his sister's money, couldn't get the staff published in the columns of the Tribune. Yet the Tribune is a republican paper. Its editor is a republican. It pretends to be devoted to its party. Its editor was a democrat when he first struck town, and in times not long gone by his paper has supported democratic candidates for office. Yet because just now it is pretending hard to be a republican, and because there is a presumable profit in printing such republican literature as may come this way, it is printing the mud that the Bourne discrediting committee is slinging.

Bourne has a right to sling his own mud. The Enterprise has a political right to sling its OWN mud. But no American newspaper at this time has the right to sling borrowed mud at the administration that is keeping this nation out of the war-hell that has swallowed half the world. Yet so hungry is the lamentable object published in the county seat to get a chance to suck the political campaign sponge that it prints, two columns wide, on its editorial page, the following Bourne mud in a current issue:

"As a judge of men to carry

A man with a Bank Account has a grub-stake in Prosperity and will make the best worker in the world's workshop.

THE BANK OF OREGON CITY
34 Years in Business

on the civil work of the government, the president has been a conspicuous and lamentable failure. We shudder to think what would happen if he should have been charged with the selection of men to carry on military operations.

The Enterprise didn't have to print that outburst of Bourne's disappointed spleen; it could have had the decency to cut it out. The Enterprise would have received just as much money if it hadn't said that, and it might have made a few more friends for its cause. The Enterprise might have been patriotic enough to avoid that thrust at President Wilson, who in these trying times is constantly on duty at the helm of the ship of state. Bourne, in his self-pitying rage at his defeat at the hands of the electorate, may be pardoned for attempting to blacken the name of the President of the United States—but there is no excuse for the Enterprise to echo his maudlin mouthings.

President Wilson may have made his mistakes. He may have paid a political debt in appointing Bryan to his cabinet. He may have moved with apparent slowness at times. But no American can honestly say that his administration in any way has been a "conspicuous and lamentable failure," nor does any real American fear what will happen to this nation under Woodrow Wilson should the United States become involved in war. Outside of Jonathan Bourne and his hirelings the nation is solidly behind the president, it is satisfied with his handling of the situation, it trusts him and his assistants in government duty, and it thanks God every night that President Woodrow Wilson has had the infinite wisdom and judgment to keep the American people out of a senseless conflict, out of debt and suffering, out of heart-breaking war.

The Courier does not say these things because it is a democratic newspaper. It is not campaigning. It says them solely because it has a deep and profound respect for Woodrow Wilson as a man, and because it does not think this is the time to say that the President of the United States is a "conspicuous and lamentable failure." At this writing the Courier, like the great majority of the newspapers in the United States, is American in its policy and is trying to be patriotic to the best of its ability.

And the Courier does not believe that American citizens, be they democrats, republicans or anything else, will differ from it when it says that the Enterprise committed a grave and shocking error when it printed the filthy mud sent it by Bourne and his henchman. It was bad enough for Bourne to have fathered the stuff—but it was pretty close to treason for the Enterprise to lend its support to the sentiment.

THE SILENT VOTE

Councilman Roy B. Cox worked up quite a peeve against the Courier last week and called this paper names, and all because the Courier said that he, together with Van Auker and Hackett, had not voted either way on the two elevator measures which had a double-council-meeting discussion the week before. The Courier's remarks that riled Mr. Cox were as follows:

"People who witnessed the councilmanic wrangle gathered that the three (Van Auker, Cox and Hackett) did not have the courage of their convictions and so didn't care to vote either way."

Mr. Cox says he voted positively and in as loud a voice as he could against the sale of the elevator bonds, and he thinks he voted against the completion of the elevator's hydraulic equipment. The Courier did not have a representative on hand at the particular meeting, so it had to take the word of other folk who were. And there seems to be a division of opinion.

Mayor Jones says he did not hear Cox vote, that he did not hear anybody vote against the elevator measures, and that only Albright, Andrews, Long, Metzner and Meyer voted for them. This made the record stand "no votes against the measures" and Mayor Jones commented upon it at the time. Recorder Loder's minutes also show that there were no votes against the measures.

Chief Shaw says he heard Cox vote against one of the measures, but is not sure about the other, and Councilman Metzner sides with the mayor. However, the Courier is glad to give Councilman Cox the benefit of the doubt, and record him as voting as loudly as he could against the elevator bonds.

And to Councilman Cox the Courier desires to say that it is glad he had the courage of his convictions.

All of which reminds us that too often there is a "silent vote" in the council that dodges responsibility. Councilman Toose was the inventor of the silent vote in local legislative circles, and often took advantage of a refusal to voice any preference upon measures under discussion. Once, in fact, the council voted as a whole that Mr. Toose would have to vote!

We have heard a lot about the "silent vote" in elections—if we remember correctly it was the "silent vote" that was blamed (or praised) for throwing the books into a Mr. Roosevelt, who some years ago wanted a third cup of coffee. We often wondered what the "silent vote" really was; but after sitting in at a number of council sessions we got more familiar with it.

The Courier hopes that there will never again be an opportunity for a misunderstanding as to how the councilmen vote on the questions put to them. The Courier likes men to call spades spades, and to vote "aye" or "nay" in clear and dulcet tones. Then there will not be anybody blamed for doing something that they didn't. Each councilman is expected to vote on every question, and it clears the air some out from the metropolis on the car, and brought with him three bottles of light wine. He got off the car, paused in Oregon City long enough to get his horse and rig from a livery barn, and then started on his way home. And one of the Honorable Christian Schuebel's supporters called the attention of the police to the fact that the farmer had three bottles and the farmer was pinched.

This is not the first time that farmers have been arrested for passing through Oregon City on their way to their homes with small amounts of beer or wine in their possession. And every farmer who has been thus arrested for a technical violation of the Schuebel-drawn ordinance, has gone to his home later and noted that the ordinance drawn by "Friend of the People" Schuebel permits express companies to do the very thing that it explicitly prohibits common people from doing. And then the farmer has decided that maybe he won't vote for Chris, and has so told his friends.

The Courier is sorry for the Honorable Christian Schuebel, and his divided love. If he didn't love prohibition quite so much, he might not have drawn such a strict ordinance; and on the other hand, if he didn't love office quite so much, it wouldn't make so much difference how many farmers were pinched for technically violating Oregon City's little law—and violating it without criminal intent. The city ordinance was meant to apply strictly to Oregon City; yet since it has been in force fully half of its victims have been farmers who resided well outside of the corporate limits of the city.

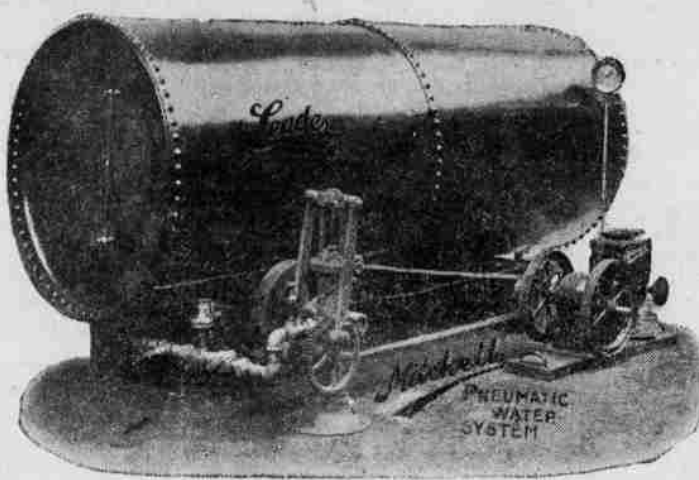

It is well to be sorry for Chris. He is truly up against it. He is so devoted to what he thinks is right that he is actually campaigning against himself in his race for the re-father goes to the bank and mortgages the cow, so that his young hopefuls can purchase Bink's Elements of Psychology, Spilvet's First Aids to Agriculture, John Doe's Treatise Upon Practical Sociology and the purple-covered and censored edition of The Merchant of Venice and Julius Caesar.

This is the time of the year when daughter puts on the new dress that is two inches longer than the one she wore last year, and when she wants to borrow mother's switch and do her hair up high. It is also the season when Willie objects to wearing the patched pants he enjoyed all summer, and expresses a desire for long trousers, red socks and a shirt with a fancy collar.

This is the time of the year when Mamie Smith, who last year graduated from high-school, returns to our midst with a summer-school certificate, objects to being hailed as "Mame," tells us that we must address her as "Miss Smith," and adds the information that she is going to teach folk-lore dances twice a week in the grade school. It is also the time of the year when awkward Tom Brown, who for the last two years has been selling Wootzy's Wonderful Remedies, appears in a new, pale green suit that doesn't fit, and says in a deep and throaty voice that he is going to teach school in the next district, and he hopes that if we want any more of his famous line of remedies that we want ask him for them during school hours.

This is also the time of year when Ma and Pa sit around the house and feel lost, because the children aren't drawing pictures on the wall paper. Pa reads the morning paper, comments usually upon the war, and then asks Ma what this psychology stuff is mate, resource and population that we have. We are going to look ahead, and not behind; we are going to build and not tear down; we are going to be constructive and not destructive.

We are going to stop patronizing the mail order houses and are going to buy from our home merchants. If they haven't got what we want, we are going to ask them to send for it, and wait until they get it, so that our money will stay in circulation here and benefit all of us. We are going to patronize home industry, in every way, and we are going to praise our neighbor's stuff even more than he praises the things that we raise or make. We are going to do the best we can, and we are all of us going to feel better for it.

Who is going to do all this, you ask? Why all of us, everybody, and especially YOU.

Try it, and see how much better things will be, and what a golden age we shall all of us step into.

SUCH IS LIFE

The conservative members of the Commission on Industrial Relations must prepare for a thorough roasting from exponents of standpatism. They have made a report on industrial unrest, and not only admitted the existence of such a thing, but did not say that it was due to envy of the industrious and thrifty by lazy, incompetent spendthrifts, spurred on by professional agitators. Don't they see that if unrest is not due to such causes, that it must rest on some justifiable ground? From a plutocratic point of view, Messrs. Aishon, Weinstock and Ballard might as well have approved all of Frank P. Walsh's report.

The United States postal system is a wonderful institution.

It makes a lot of money, but most of the time it is heavily in debt.

However, it is not of that we would speak. The general subject of debt is painful to us.

But we would discourse upon the wonders of the postal service. For instance, the other day we got a magazine.

We subscribed to the magazine, so it is not wonderful in itself that we got it. Only the manner thereof is wonderful.

The magazine was lying in our post office box, and it had no wrapper upon it. Nor was our name printed anywhere upon it. Yet it was in our box.

And we marvelled greatly how the post office clerks knew it was our magazine, and how it traveled all the way from Philadelphia to us without our name or address being upon it.

And after marveling for sometime we asked one of the rural carriers that we know how he supposed it happened; laying great stress as we inquired upon the fact that our magazine did not bear our name.

And he said: "That's easy, one of the boys took it out of the cover to read it, and then forgot to put the cover back when he placed the magazine again in the box. You got the magazine, so why should you kick?"

And we used to think that the only things that got read in the mails were postcards. Now we know better. P. S.—This happened in Milwaukee, so the Oregon City bunch needn't get sore.

They have clocks in the streetscars in Ottawa. The clocks are regulated twice a day, and are reasonably accurate. They have had them in the streetscars for 24 years. Ottawa is the only city in North America that thus has the nerve to show its streetcar passengers how long it takes a streetcar to get from the corner to the depot in time to miss the morning train.

War is what General Sherman is said to have said it was. Since the British Isles have been in the center of attention from the Germans, there has developed a shortage of fish—in fact it is almost impossible to get small fish to fry, upon which millions of the folk in the coastal towns live. Great Britain seems to be able to catch German submarines in nets, but her people cannot catch little fish—probably because the submarines and the exposures of mines and sinking ships have scared all the little fishes away.

Prohibition having carried in South Carolina, what will the governor of North Carolina say now when he goes visiting? He will probably ask where "the place around the corner" is, and then continue according to the old formula.

We know an attorney who accepted $30 as full payment for drawing papers in a divorce action, and who then put in the complaint that the plaintiff wanted $200 for attorney's fee. "Get 'em while you can, for the ripe ones soon fall," appears to be the motto of this stoney hearted lawyer.
