Pure mountain water for us next week!

Councilman Templeton has been "fishing and hunting" lately. As if that was a new pastime.

"Two thousand five hundred doctors are needed" says a British army authority. Evidently there has been another "victory" somewhere.

Tourist business in California having fallen off somewhat, Lassen peak again breaks into eruption. Why doesn't Oregon get a trained volcano?

We note that Estacados have killed another dog for a wolf. It would seem as if the rugged dwellers of the hill country ought to wear a new kind of glasses.

The press tells us that a child of twelve told John D. Rockefeller, Jr., how to make a profit of 40 cents annually on a ten-cent investment. And next day gasoline went up a cent a gallon. Evidently John learned the lesson.

Figures show strange things. The state tax commission values Oregon City property at $2,800,000 odd, and West Linn property at $2,400,000 odd. Yet to look down at the two municipalities from an aeroplane a casual observer would never think they so nearly balanced up.

Grade crossings are beginning to be recognized in Oregon as not altogether advantageous. Some of the effete Eastern states have already discovered this truth, and force the railroads to build safe overhead or underground passageways for traffic every time a public road is crossed. Maybe this will happen in Oregon in 1921.

Supposing the people of England and France refuse to recognize the "mortgage" that the bankers want to put upon those two nations to secure the half billion dollar war loan. How will the United States banks go about it to collect? Will we be asked to declare war and foreclose on the mortgages with shot and shell?

The land grant conference and the water power conference do not appear to have amounted to much more than any other political convention. Americans are getting more and more socialistic in their thought, and like less and less to have a selected few gather together and tell them what is best. One of these days the politicians will discover this, and will adopt a new line of buncombe.

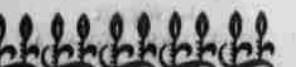

Oregon has its reward at last. A new "farm paper" has been started, and announces that its editorial policy will follow that of the Oregon Voter's Pamphlet—in other words both sides of all questions discussed will be presented. If a number of our "moulders of public opinion" among the magazines would follow this example, people would place more confidence in what they read. But the Oregon System has accomplished something, anyway—it has apparently reformed one magazine.

IN REAL LIFE

It seldom happens in real life that the "tail wags the dog" or that people "get the cart before the horse."

They are merely extravagant examples of things being done in the wrong way. They say there's a wrong way and a right way to do everything. In taking care of your money the right way is to deposit it in a good bank like ours where it will be perfectly safe yet subject to your check whenever needed. No need to tell about the wrong ways to handle your money. It's the right way that needs to be known and followed. Try this bank.

THE BANK OF OREGON CITY
Oldest Bank in Clackamas County

Divine right seems to be slipping in Europe. We have not noticed any wild enthusiasm over the Czar's plan to supplant his able assistants and once again become boss of all the Russias; and the papers haven't said a word about Kink George for a long, long time. About the only way a potentate can get in the front page type these days is to die; and none of them seem to be willing to do that for their country—though a whole lot of them are willing to let the common people die by the thousands.

MORE ABOUT EXPERTS

The Courier desires at this time to give good cheer to those members of the grange, and those individual farmers, who do not think that Clackamas county ought to go to the expense of engaging a Federal agricultural expert. A bulletin of the Department of Agriculture, just come to hand, should be read by every one of these gentlemen; for it contains the glad news—to them, at least—that there are not enough agricultural experts to fill the demands already made upon the government for such service.

There are over 1,000 such agricultural experts working in counties throughout the United States, and many of them are doubling up and working in two counties, so as to meet the demand. And the government regrets that it cannot train and equip and otherwise qualify enough men and women to fill the positions that are open. It seems that our Uncle Sam goes to considerable labor to teach the experts to mix well with people, and only selects such folk as have ability to understand the needs and problems of the ambitious and progressive farmer. And men like this are hard to find.

So those of us who don't want any help from the government may cheer up and take heart—the chances are that even if Clackamas county asked for a Federal expert one couldn't be found ready to take the job. Thus do Fate, the great government and the demand of other sections all conspire together to save the Clackamas farmer from being burdened by an added fraction of a mill on his tax levy.

THE HACKETT IDEA

Discussing a remonstrance against the improvement of one of the downtown side streets in the county seat, Councilman Hackett rose in council meeting last week and said that as long as the property owners didn't want the street improved the council had no right to force an improvement down their throats. Incidentally Mr. Hackett moved to sustain every remonstrance offered at the session—and there were something over half a dozen—so it is safe to assume that last week Mr. Hackett believed that the council ought to obey the wishes of the property holders of Oregon City.

And believing that Mr. Hackett thought the council ought to obey the wishes of the property holders, some of whom elected him to office; it is also reasonable to think that Mr. Hackett believed that the council ought to obey the voters.

And if he does believe this, the Courier would like to know what made him change his mind—for it was but a few short days ago when Mr. Hackett announced that "there will be no more bond issues in this town if I can prevent it."

Mr. Hackett is a prospective candidate for the nomination of mayor, should any body offer it to him. That is, he is a receptive candidate, and hopes that somebody will provide him with a chance to run "on a platform of strict economy." In view of this, and considering the approaching municipal election, it would be very interesting to have Mr. Hackett explain how it is that when property owners ask for a stoppage of civic betterment their wishes ought to be granted; but when property holders ask for improvements, and vote a bond issue to cover their cost, their wishes ought not to be respected.

Why does Mr. Hackett draw the line?

AMUSING, AT THAT

One of the best ways of making a living—at least one of the best as far as financial success goes—is suing a corporation. Many a nimble-jointed person will repeatedly fall off trains and cars and "sue the company" for an imaginary injury; and need no other means of support. Also there are people who make it a business of suing corporations, not in hopes of winning their suits; but in well-founded expectation that the corporation will "settle" for a much smaller sum—which only too often the corporations will do to avoid bother and publicity.

Of course all suits against corporations are not of this character. Many suits are perfectly justifiable, and are brought in good faith; probably the majority of them are. But even at that, some of them are funny.

Recently the courts of this county were burdened with a legal matter that had its amusing side. A man who leased an amusement park asked for ten thousand dollars damages from a corporation that was planning to run an interurban railroad past his resort. The plaintiff opined that the railroad would endanger the lives of some of his patrons, that it would put him to much extra expense in the hiring of gatemen and watchmen to protect his patrons, and that it would occupy room that might otherwise be given over to amusement enterprises. And he asked for ten thousand dollars as the damages that would result to his place in the first four years of the railroad's operation.

Considering that the average amusement park thrives solely upon the money contributed by people who are brought to it by means of some sort of a transportation line, the demand seemed peculiar. And considering that the more lines of transportation that run to an amusement resort, the greater its patronage, the contention advanced seemed quite humorous. Especially did it seem odd, when the fact was considered that before Coney Island, the greatest amusement resort in the world, was hooked up with New York by frequent and cheap trolley service it didn't pay dividends. But after the cheap trolleys started hauling New York's millions to Coney Island, there arose such wonderful things as Luna Park, Wonderland, Dreamland, and the other features which, constructed at an outlay of thousands and thousands of dollars, returned profits to their owners that made them millionaires in a few months.

The jury in the case in point evidently thought that a transportation line might be a good adjunct of an amusement resort, for instead of giving the plaintiff the ten thousand dollars demanded, they gave him $150, and permitted him to pay the costs of his action. The trial of the matter produced a fund of humorous testimony, and as it thus made life more joyous, maybe it was worth thinner and thinner. In the land where the wolf has gone even charity soup is not needed for an existence—and aside from that we have known the wolf a long, long time, in lean years and in fat ones when the hunt goes good—and we never knew him to starve yet. And we will make a bet with John Stark—a bet of any amount that we can slip by our watchful sheriff, who is much opposed to gambling—that wherever the wolf goes he will "get by" without indulging in thin charity soup. Here's hoping, anyway.

CLEVER WORK

Political cunning is not yet dead—far be it from such.

Not only is George C. Brownell still with us, but just take a look at Linn E. Jones, mayor of the county seat.

Last week Mayor Jones told the council that he thought it would be a perfectly stunning idea if the heads of all the committees, when they brought in their report on the progress of the budget at the regular November meeting, also submitted estimates for the needs of their committees in 1916.

In other words, the mayor wants the council to make out a budget for 1916 right now.

Seeing as there will be a new mayor and some new councilmen next year this is a classy piece of work. The chances are excellent that any budget the present council prepares will be a lovely thing for the taxpayer to feast his eyes upon. As the present councilmen will not have the spending of the money (in many instances), and as economy is the greatest word in councilmanic language these days, any budget that some fine apples to sell. On the next farm to his lived another man, who also had apples, but the second man's apples were not as good as those grown by the first man. In fact some of them were wormy, and some of them didn't ripen, while yet others were blown off by the big wind, and lay on the ground, where the industrious ants nibbled at them.

Now the first man, knowing that he had fine apples, didn't worry about being able to sell them, and he sat under the hemlock tree that grew near the porch and waited for the buyers to come around.

The second man went down to town and put an advertisement in the paper. The advertisement was perfectly true in its wording, and ran as follows: "You can have no idea of the kind of apples I am selling for fifty cents a barrel unless you buy some of them."

And the apple buyers read the advertisement, and went to his place and bought his apples; while the first man sat under his tree and waited for customers.

The moral of this tale is two-fold; first, it doesn't matter how good your product is, you cannot sell it unless you advertise; and secondly you can sell almost anything if you advertise.

Farmers and businessmen alike ought to take this to heart. The Courier is an advertising medium. Not only that, but it only advertises things that it believes are worth advertising. All its readers read its advertisements, and most of them have discovered that advertisements in the Courier mean what they say.

Every merchant in Clackamas county who doesn't advertise in the Courier is either missing a chance to build up his trade, or else he doesn't care whether he has any trade or not.

while. But to the onlooker the attempt to get that particular ten thousand dollars for the cause stated looked—well, it looked funny.

JOHN WAS RIGHT

That is he was partly right. John Stark is the party here referred to. John didn't think much of the "Wolf Howls," as they appeared in the Courier, and said so.

Well, readers of the paper this week will notice a decided improvement in the more or less literary dish offered them. They will note the absence of the "Wolf Howls." The "Wolf," who so persistently howled, week after week, has gone the way of all wolves in these parts, and while the county has paid no bounty on his carcass, he is nevertheless drawn and quartered as far as these columns are concerned.

In a way we hated to slaughter the old wolf, for in some ways he was almost as lovable and tractable as a collie dog. But in other ways he was a nuisance and a savage and so we had to put him out of his misery. And aside from that he was getting lazy, as any wild animal will that is kept in captivity, and that is fed regularly. Here passeth the Wolf.

However, John Stark was wrong in one thing, the wolf will not have to live on charity soup, which will get the present city dads prepare will be about the finest example of "money saving" ever prepared. They will pinch each nickel so hard that the buffalo bull will grunt, and they will squeeze the pennies until the Indian and Abe Lincoln will be sure that things have tightened up since their day.

And the beauty of it all will be that the new administration will be embarrassed at the very start, and will have to try to live up (or down) to the mark set for it by the present council. Which, as a natural cinch, they won't be able to do.

And then what? Why, at the end of 1916, when next year's council finds that it has exceeded the budget that it had no hand in the making, the present councilmen can throw out their chests and exclaim: "Well, by heck, them boys couldn't save money for the people the way we did!"

All of which is so funny that it ought to be killed before it happens. But at that, this year's council has got to find some way to get praise—and if it can't get it now, it is not to be blamed for stacking the cards so that folks in the future will look back at it and say that it was good.

The mayor is sure some clever guy.

PERSONAL STUFF

There once was a man who had

And more than that: the man who doesn't advertise in his home paper, so he can tell the people of his neighborhood what he has to sell, not only shows that he doesn't care very much about business; but he has no license to holler when the mail order house slips into his field and underbids him.

IN HIDING AGAIN

Comes news over the wire that the Rev. Dwight Nelwell Hillis, who has for some years been trying to fill the shoes of the late and great Henry Ward Beecher, in Plymouth church, Brooklyn, has become deeply involved in financial difficulties. In "confessing" this to his congregation Dr. Hillis unloaded a verbal spasm in which he made of himself a hero, and in which he pattered a lot of guff in regard to the temptations with which he had been beset, and the lure of affluence. But boiled down to plain English, Dr. Hillis had not only been living beyond his income, but he had been speculating in a manner which no man of his income should have attempted.

Dr. Hillis is a minister of the gospel. If you or I, gentle reader, did what he had done, our neighbors would say harsh things about us, and not waste any sympathy upon us. Our creditors might even throw us
