SUCCESSFUL CHAUTAUQUA

Gladstone Chautauqua has just closed the most successful year in its history. Not only did the association realize more money from the gate receipts this year but the attractions, with one or two exceptions, were received with considerable welcome by the audiences. The crowning feature of the season, of course, was Billy Sunday, who dedicated the new auditorium. Mr. Sunday appeared at the request of the directors of the association and would accept no money for his services.

Great credit is due the men who unreservedly guaranteed payment for the attractions and were not only willing to stand a monetary loss but who worked many hours to make the gathering a success as a social and economic benefit. These men deserve the thanks of the entire community and Chautauquans appreciate their efforts.

Since the day, 24 years ago, when H. E. Cross, "daddy of the Willamette Valley Chautauqua," leased the beautiful 75-acre park to the association for 50 years, taking in exchange the "huge" sum of one dollar, to the opening of this year's program, it has been a question whether the next year would see a return of this great school for better citizenship.

A small group of public spirited men have been the moving spirits behind the educational gatherings, some years standing a loss by going into their private purses to pay the obligations of the association, yet always ready to guarantee the money for the coming year.

This year has witnessed a change in the condition of affairs. Not only has the association cleaned up its debts through the gate receipts during the sessions but 80 shares of stock were sold and this money will be spent in making improvements on the grounds. It is planned to have cinder paths leading to the auditorium and permanent streets through the grove along which the tents will be pitched and numbered, thus eliminating the confusion of former years. Other needed changes will be made.

The one person whose efficiency stands out in this year's work is Thos. A. Burke, who served his first year as executive secretary. Mr. Burke may well take for his motto, "always leave them laughing when you say good-bye," from the happy expressions of folks who bid him adieu Sunday night. Not only were the principal features handled promptly and without friction but the minor details, those irritating little things that can so easily mar the success of a huge undertaking, were looked after with the painstaking attention that was given to every phase of the work.

The "publicity work" excited the admiration of newspaper men and the publicity experts with the chautauqua circuit supplying the talent. The many personal inquiries and those coming by mail were answered with dispatch, briefly and courteously. Minor and major disputes and misunderstandings that some times occur in the best regulated families were diplomatically settled by Mr. Burke, whose constant thought seemed to be the comfort and convenience of his great Chautauqua family. No task seemed too arduous! No detail too small to receive his personal attention when the success of the entire ensemble seemed to require it.

It was his first year as executive secretary, although he has been connected with the association as publicity manager for three years. To his training in newspaper work is largely due the successful advertising campaigns which he carried on and to his knowledge of human nature as a lawyer is largely due the reason for the happy thanks that were showered upon him when the season ended.

France flattened out Germany like a steam roller would flatten out a dozen eggs. France was powerful because France was united. France was united because she had mountains and seas upon 80 per cent of her frontiers. She had more wealth than Germany because she had better soil than Germany, and more and better seaports. She made her wealth out of her land and out of her ships. Germany had poorer land and fewer ships. She could not have sea power because she lacked unity. She lacked unity because her geography did not as yet permit her to evolve a united state. A united state came to Germany only with railroads and other modern industry.

How Changes Came

Herein we have the great changes as regards the relative positions of France and Germany. The industrial revolution altered their comparative status. The industrial revolution of the nineteenth century did more to change the world than all the forces of 2000 years previously. Men began to make their bread and butter not out of the soil, nor by tools, but by the use of mines and factories and high power machinery. In a day of steam and electricity, of iron and of steel, Germany found herself immensely rich in the essentials, which are coal and iron.

Poor in Coal and Iron

France, poor in coal and iron, can not be great in a day of modern industry. Take the iron and coal out of Germany, put it in the hillsides of France, and all those intellectual forces which form the mind of France would teach the absolute necessity of large families. French mothers would have large families to work her mines and factories, her railroads and her ships, and thus France would soon have 68,000,000 of people. Without her coal and iron all the editors, professors, clergymen and government experts of Germany would teach the absolute necessity of having small families and soon Germany would have 39,000,000 of people instead of 68,000,000.

People Much Alike

The notion that these nations are fundamentally different because they speak different languages is utterly wrong. About two-thirds of the people of France and one-third of the people of Germany are Celts, that is, they have dark hair and dark eyes, round heads and round faces, stocky forms and emotional hearts. Reversely, about 35 per cent of the people of France and about 65 per cent of the people of Germany are Teutonic or Germanic. This Germanic population has light hair and blue eyes, oval faces and long heads, tall bodies and very practical dispositions. There are all sorts of admixtures of these types but the proportion holds generally. The Celts are the hill country people. The only difference between the populations of England and of Germany is that in England there are many more Germans per thousand people than in Germany.

English and German

Let us now compare the English and the Germans. Their geography is fundamentally different; hence the difference in the history and their government. Great Britain is an island. When King James of Scotland became King James of England in 1603 Great Britain was united from sea to sea and set out upon the building of her world empire. Because she was an island she could center her efforts upon naval power and ocean commerce. With naval power and ocean commerce she built her modern Rome. She beat down Spain in the 16th century and took North America. She conquered in the 17th century and took India. During 75 years of war from 1744 to 1815 she made an end of French overseas imperialism. Her naval power crushed Napoleon. The present war is simply chapter four in the history of the British navy and of the British empire. When Germany struck against the naval power of England she was hopelessly lost.

Fighting Ground of Empire

Turning to Germany, and starting from the fact that Germany is surrounded on three and on-half sides by land, we perceive that she has always had open frontiers and many enemies. Throughout she has been the fighting ground of Europe. She built her military power in Prussia, because that was the only power which could evolve a protecting central government. In England democracy won at an early date and made England practically a republic because the king had no standing army.

Militarism vs. Democracy

Militarism and democracy cannot live in the same nation at the same time. Because the English people refused to serve in the king's army, King Charles lost his head in 1649. Because Englishmen refused to enlist in the army of George III, America won her independence in 1776. If America today builds up a great standing army with a host of officers, American democracy will be lost forever. Forget everything else I say here, but remember this as long as you live—Militarism and freedom cannot live in the same country at the same time. One will eat out the heart of the other. We must choose which one we shall have.

Where Germany Lost

Germany, coming to the period of her revolution in 1848, lost her fight for freedom. Her democracy struggled bravely and won the victory in west Germany and south Germany. But the militarism of Prussia and Austria were too much for the forces of liberty. At their great convention at Frankfurt-on-the-Main in 1849, the republicans wrote a constitution for a free Germany. But it never became a law in fact. When freedom was finally crushed by the forces of militarism and autocracy over 2,000,000 of Germans came to America. Losing her democratic blood, Germany lost her hope of salvation in that generation.

FAIR CONSPIRATORS

By SADIE OLCOTT

The new thing in the shape of a marriageable man in Pentouville was McDonnell. He was a young lawyer, who went to the city every day, Pentouville being a suburban town, and did not know that in the consideration of the marriageable girls of the place he was not only a new thing, but a very desirable thing.

"This McDonnell fellow," said Emily Chandler to a number of young Pentouville girls who were discussing the eligible, or, rather, the want of eligible, of the town, "deserves to be taken down from his high horse."

"What high horse?" asked Phoebe Brooks.

"Why, he has refused to be introduced to any of us."

"I doubt it," said Phoebe.

"Why do you doubt it?"

"Because there's no authority for it; it's mere talk. Anyway if it's true Mr. McDonnell probably has his own reason for not making our acquaintance."

"For my part," chirped Lucy Ellison, "if he were to ask to be introduced to me I would decline the honor."

"That's a good idea, Lucy," said Miss Chandler. "Suppose we all take that stand. If any one proposes to introduce him we'll decline."

An agreement was entered into by the girls to this effect, but they had no opportunity to show their spleen to McDonnell, because he did not ask to be introduced to any of them. An aunt of his lived in Pentouville, and McDonnell spent such hours as hung heavy on his hands at her house, where he was very much at home. This lady, Mrs. Meriwether, very soon heard of this conspiracy and got the names of the conspirators.

One morning Miss Chandler received a note from Mrs. Meriwether stating that her nephew, Ralph McDonnell, had seen the young lady at church and had expressed a desire to be introduced to her. Would Miss Chandler dine with Mrs. Meriwether for the purpose of enabling the nephew to make Miss Chandler's acquaintance?

Miss Chandler dispatched an acceptance in hot haste. McDonnell showed her the attention he felt called upon to show his aunt's guest, and Miss Chandler was delighted. But she did not speak of the meeting to any of her girl friends.

Soon after this Miss Lucy Ellison received an invitation by telephone from Mrs. Meriwether to come over for cards in the evening. Mrs. Meriwether's nephew had seen Miss Ellison at the Turner club and had expressed a desire to know her.

The young lady accepted.

During a period of several weeks every one of the conspirators had been informed by Mrs. Meriwether that her nephew had expressed a desire to be introduced to her, all receiving invitations for the purpose. Every girl accepted the invitation, but not one of them said a word to any of the others about the acceptance. Nor did either Mrs. Meriwether or Mr. McDonnell say anything either. Phoebe Brooks, who had doubted the report that had led to Mr. McDonnell's ostracization, was one who was invited to Mrs. Meriwether's house to meet the ostracized gentleman, but was disinclined to act contrary to her friends. She had neither acquiesced nor declined to take part in the ostracization, but not liking to place herself in opposition to her friends, found it convenient to have an engagement.

Mrs. Meriwether's next move was to invite the girls whom her nephew had expressed a desire to know to an informal dance at her house, partners, of course, being provided. The girls were invited at 8, the men at half past 8.

The first girl to arrive was Lucy Ellison. The second was Emily Chandler. They arrived almost simultaneously and met in the ladies' robing room. They started on seeing each other, and each stammered an apology for being there. When they went down into the drawing room McDonnell greeted each as if he had known her for years. As each girl came in and stood on the threshold staring at the conspirators who had already arrived the host advanced and greeted her cordially, indicating by some well timed remark a previous acquaintance. The last girl to arrive was Miss Brooks. When she entered Mrs. Meriwether with unusual formality introduced, "My nephew, Mr. McDonnell."

The girls already arrived looked at one another. Some colored, some gave an embarrassed giggle, some were angered, but one feeling pertained to all. To use an expression common among them and the young fellows they knew, they had been "stung."

Nevertheless the hostess and the host, her nephew, manifested no knowledge of the real situation, but set about entertaining them to the best of their ability. The young men invited soon began to come in, and it was not long before the girls were forgetting the lesson they had received in the dance. Fortunately that lesson had been for all except Miss Brooks, but Mr. McDonnell had the magnanimity to show her no more attention than the next of his aunt's guests.

However, he was not always bound to refrain from showing a preference, and though he had the good sense and gentlemanlike instinct to treat the other girls with friendliness, it was soon manifest that he considered himself Miss Brooks' especial property. In due time they made a match.

It was a unity of blood and iron under Bismark. Germany's enslaved people received from Bismark the rulership of the Hohenzollerns. Everything done by Bismark and the Hohenzollerns was done wrong, must be undone and done over again. Germany must go back, in tears and bitterness, in sackcloth and ashes to 1848 and build her nation over again in freedom. When she does this I hope that America will be ready, not only to make peace with Germany, but to lead in making peace with all the world and for all time.

Patriotism a Superstition

The time is come to recognize the fact and to say boldly that national patriotism is a superstition of yesterday. We must outgrow it. We must have a clear vision of the larger aspects of the world life of today. Just as the 13 separate and divided patriotisms of the 13 American colonies gave way to national patriotism under the constitution, so must the separate and divided patriotisms of our various nations of today give way in all our hearts and minds to the internationalism of a world brotherhood.

Blue Field With the Stars

When the Stars and Stripes was made the flag of this nation, Benjamin Franklin declared that he was very happy that the form of the flag included the blue field with the stars. The blue field, he said, represented the sky over the whole nation, with a star for every state. The time would come, he observed, when that blue field would represent the sky around the whole world, and contain a star for every nation.

A Good Time Coming

It was the faith of Franklin, as it has been the faith of every really great teacher of mankind throughout the history of the world, that the time will come when spears will actually be beaten into pruning hooks and swords into plowshares. Let me congratulate you that you live in the period of the world's history when this great consummation is to be possible. Yesterday you were patriots. Tomorrow you will be inter-nationalists. Today your chief government is still the government at Washington. But there is meeting at Washington an international commission. Our government is but one of a number of allied states.

At the Close of the War

Let us see that at the close of this war Germany and Austria be included in the United States of the world. Let us begin today by inspiring ourselves and our children with a true spirit of fellowship and brotherhood with all the nations of the world. There is room for all. There is bread for all. There is sufficient wealth for all. Let there be freedom and justice for all and we shall have solved in our generation the greatest problem which history has placed before us for solution.

Loses Purse from Stocking

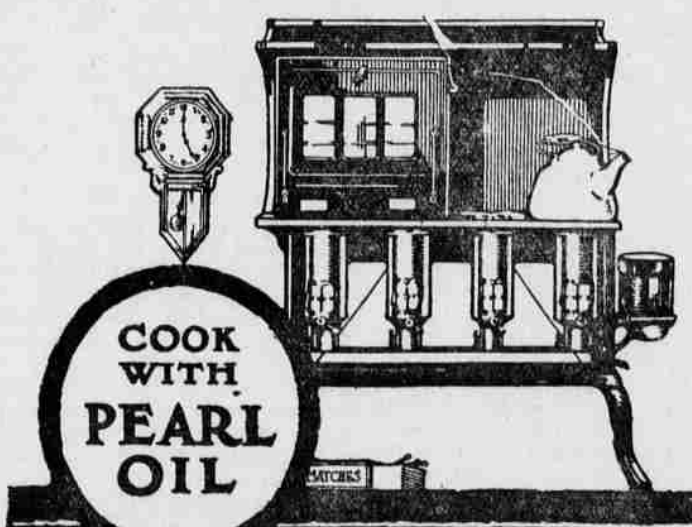

While picking berries Sunday, Mrs. M. Hein, of Bull Run, ripped a hole in her stocking and lost a pocket-book containing $24.60. The purse was found by a nephew of Mrs. Hein but she disclaimed ownership at the time. Later she discovered that the purse was hers but the nephew refused to give it up. Constable Jack Frost was called to the farm by Mrs. Hein and succeeded in adjusting the matter without making any arrests.

Mount on Draft Board

Dr. Orel C. Welsh, who was recently appointed a member of the local war draft board, is unable to serve because he is within the age limit himself. His place was taken by Dr. Hugh S. Mount.
