WORTH-WHILE ROADS

It seems certain that there will be little effective opposition to the proposal to issue $6,000,000 in road bonds for hard surfacing the main arteries of travel in Oregon, and it is interesting to note the extent to which enthusiasts have made their plans, upon the hope that the bond issue will be endorsed at the polls.

Among the most important suggestions that have been made that will regard Clackamas county is that looking toward the improvement of a road between Oregon City and Portland. It is the idea of those who stand sponsors for the plan to connect on this end with the Oregon City-Parkplace paved road and at the other end with the East Eighty-second street road out of Portland. Such a highway would be paved throughout its length and would be, finally, the east side link in a loop road with Portland at one end and Oregon City at the other.

According to the outline of the plan, the proposed road would be without a grade, making a level, surfaced haul from this city to Portland on the east side of the river. The road on the west side, which will undoubtedly be surfaced as soon as the money from the bond issue becomes available, would also be practically without a grade. The value of such a highway can hardly be figured. It would be a main road for thousands of farmers and would be a delight to motorists from everywhere.

It appears that the east side road—the gradeless highway—will be a reality in spite of the action regarding the bond issue and before many years it will be a unit in a hard surfaced highway from Portland to the southern line of the state. California will improve her roads to the line and Washington is rapidly coming to such action. The completion of the Lincoln highway across the continent and the southern highway will mean a series of ideal roads upon which travel will be easy and pleasant to all parts of the continent from the Pacific coast.

There is no doubt that these important roads are merely the forerunners of a network of surfaced roads over the nation. Before many years we will find almost as much travel by motor car as by railroad. But the only advantage is not to the motorist, although farmers are rapidly qualifying in this classification. The farmer with his one horse shay or his lumbering big wagon will find a paved road as valuable as the automobile owner will. Easy haul for the farmer means more money in his pocket and by a sensible scheme of figuring it is apparent that the farming people of the nation will save within a short time the entire amount that they may be required to pay to provide themselves with the best roads money can produce.

But Oregon, with her proposed bond issue, has solved a great problem. The farmer's purse will not be drained for road building. The rich chap with his big machine will bear the burden of the cost. The farmer will get the fruits of this plan in just the same proportion as the man who drives the automobile for pleasure—but he will not have to pay the bill.

More's the pity, then, that the grange should find it necessary to combat the road bond proposition. The grange has everything to lose and nothing to gain in the fight. We would like to see the organization in this county and state prove to its own satisfaction and to ours that the bond issue will not be a tool for trifling interests and then put its collective shoulders to the wheel of progress and insure the passage of the road bonding measure at the election in June. Such a stand would be more worthy of the intelligence with which we of the farms and the farming communities are supposedly endowed. The road bonds are the result of progressivism in Oregon. Let the farmer not delay progress lest he find himself buried forlornly in its avalanche.

peace. Germany's sudden and still unexplained change of front cannot alter the record of the president's noble and partly successful effort to induce the belligerents to state their terms of peace.

Pacifists of the extreme type and a few Germans in the country who realize the injury inflicted on Germany by the revocation of pledges given to the United States are protesting against possible war with Germany. At a German-American mass meeting in Toledo a resolution in favor of a popular referendum to determine "whether or not we are ready and willing to join this bloody fray" was adopted, and all sorts of protests in the same interest are coming in from other quarters. If congress and the federal administration were considering the commission of an aggressive act of war these protests might be in order; but the contrary is the case. They are hoping and praying that Germany may at the last moment refrain from committing that overt act of war which will force the United States against its will into this fray. We cannot permit Mexican bandits to raid across our frontier. We cannot permit German naval commanders to raid our peaceful merchantmen and murder our citizens on the high seas after the German government has notified us that these submarine commanders have been ordered to do so, any more than we can submit to invasion by Mexican troops or bandits. In neither case do we voluntarily engage in war; we are forced into it.

We shall let Germany "save her face" if she chooses to do so by quietly ordering her naval officers to observe the recognized rules of war. It will be Germany's fault if we have war and nothing that we can now do can alter the situation. Germany now knows that the American people are behind the president.—New York Commercial.

HOPE FOR THE RENTER

We are today hearing much of "efficiency," of "farm management" and of similar terms. All this is well and may be productive of increased power, and perhaps of added purpose, on the part of the producer. It is proper, though, that the truth be kept constantly in mind, that no man, and least of all the farmer, can consistently be thought of as a mere machine, says Farm and Fireside.

Investigators, through their studies of farm practices in many states and under widely varying conditions, have made discoveries and established facts which should be of value to the great field of farming. They have pointed out the relation between profit and loss as influenced by the size of the farm, the relative investment in buildings, machinery, live stock and land, and the prevailing systems of farming.

Thus have state and national governments done for the farmer what he could not afford to do for himself. We say this because the field of experimentation is for the government rather than the individual, except perhaps for a limited number of men of independent means. Few farmers can afford to convert their farms into experiment stations. Furthermore, the findings on but one farm could not ordinarily be accepted as establishing the wisdom or folly of any system or practice. In all such investigations safety and assurance come only through numbers. Herein lies a danger.

In considering many men, in studying a large number of farms, there is a tendency to lose sight of the individual farmer and the unit farm. True, it could not be otherwise. Because there are more "average" men than signal successes or hopeless failures, it is the rule, rather than the exception, that must guide and direct.

The individual, though, must not be ignored. The "size" of the farmer is quite as important as the size of the farm. Despite the oft-repeated statement that the larger profits come from the larger farms, there are in the United States thousands of small farms paying handsome profits. Take, for instance, the case of Arnold Martin, the Swiss farmer who is becoming independent on a 20-acre Nebraska farm of much less than average fertility. There is need of recounting such successes in order to keep hope in the heart of the poor man ambitious to own a home, rather than always be a renter.

MORE ABOUT LANE

From the letter that came to the Courier office this week from one of our country correspondents the following was censored to the extent that it does not appear on the correspondence page:

"Congress has made us all feel good by not declaring war. We surely feel very grateful to our senator, Harry Lane. He is made of the right stuff and glory go with him."

Glory will go to Harry Lane only when the angels get him. He is dead so far as Oregon is concerned. Congress has not been called upon to declare war and there is not one person in the state of Oregon who believes that President Wilson wants war. He did want honorably to protect the rights and the lives of American citizens and he asked of congress nothing more than its approval of his plan. Twelve bigoted little minds thwarted the hope of protection.

The president did not want an aggressive permission. He wanted only what every honest man and woman would be willing to give him—the right to defend his country from an enemy that seems determined to come to our shores.

Harry Lane is too little a character to achieve glory. Our correspondent would be the last to enjoy seeing his unprotected countrymen shot down by an invading enemy, or an enemy murdering our people upon the high seas.

The senate filibuster denied President Wilson the right to protect the lives of our families and the sanctity of our homes. Does our correspondent feel grateful to congress? Does he believe Harry Lane should be glorified for his criminal cowardice?

WHY FOOD IS HIGH

Eugene Register Says Next Year's Crop is Sole Sign of Relief

The people of the United States have flattered themselves for two and a half years that they are remaining aloof from the great war in Europe. It is false flattery. We are not remaining aloof. We cannot remain aloof.

We have learned within the last few days that the people of the large eastern cities are actually fighting for food. The housewives of New York City are demanding that a million dollars be appropriated at once to buy food for distribution at reasonable prices. Congress is being urged to enact legislation that will temporarily take the railroads out of the hands of their owners and out of the control of the interstate commerce commission and put them practically on a war basis so food can be transported promptly to the large centers of population where people are suffering. These are measures that were only thought of in the belligerent countries after the war had been in progress for long months.

Comparisons of prices, as nearly as such comparisons can be made, indicate that food in the United States is higher in many instances than in blockaded and war-bound Germany, yet we have taken no men out of production in order to raise great armies. War is no longer a small and localized affair. The whole world is so bound together by better methods of transportation and communication that one section cannot be tremendously affected by such an agency as war without tremendously affecting all other sections.

The war is, of course, the factor of greatest importance in the food situation in the United States. The demand for foodstuffs to be exported across the seas is so tremendous and the price so high that this country has been combed from end to end for food products for export. We have been so intent on increasing our vast balance of trade that we have lost sight of what was occurring in our own country and have been awakened only by the startling condition that has developed in the large cities of the east. We have suddenly come face to face with the fact that the greatest producer nation in the world is experiencing an actual food shortage.

There are many minor causes for the situation that prevails in the large centers of the east. It is undeniably true that unscrupulous speculators have had a hand in pushing up food prices to the present high limits, for whenever there is an opportunity there will be men ready to take advantage of it. Congestion of transportation facilities, too, has played its part, for in the rush to take care of export trade the problem of provisioning our own cities has received less attention than it should. Shipments for export have been rushed in every conceivable manner, and food destined for home consumption has had to get out of the way. The entire nation has come to think in export figures and domestic business has suffered in interest.

So far as possible this condition must be remedied. There must be an earnest effort to prevent unprincipled speculators from robbing the consumer who is unable to pay. The country's transportation facilities must be so handled—without an epochal shake-up, if possible—that food will be conveyed to our own cities as well as to the war zone. But we must not lose sight of the predominant cause of the shortage. World conditions have been vastly altered within the past few years, and production in a large area has been greatly reduced. The rest of the world, which has not been wrecked by war, must make good the shortage.

We shall be deceiving ourselves if we expect prompt relief. The whole world is clamoring for food, and the United States is the chief source of supply. The only prospect for adequate relief is in next year's crop, and it behooves every American farmer to begin to plan now for the largest production this coming season of which his land is capable. Prices are bound to be high and demand strong, thus assuring profits. In addition, large production is a measure of relief that has large humanitarian importance.

TO GET FARM LOANS

Ten Borrowers Necessary to Organize
Local Association

At least 10 prospective borrowers are necessary in order to organize a local national farm-loan association, and the aggregate amount which they wish to borrow must be not less than $20,000. Every member is required by law to subscribe for shares of stock in the association ($5 shares) equal in amount to 5 per cent of his proposed loan. Each association must have a board of not less than five directors, which board elects a president, a vice-president, a secretary-treasurer and a loan committee of three members. These officers, except the secretary-treasurer, must be shareholders of the association.

The federal farm loan board will supply model forms for articles of association and by-laws, and other necessary papers. After the articles of association are signed by the members, they must be forwarded to the federal land bank of the district. These articles of association must be accompanied by a written report of the loan committee, such committee previously having appraised the farm-land security by each member and having duly indicated its approval on the application blank of each member. The loan committee's report must also include an affidavit showing that each of the members of the association has fulfilled the various requirements of the law and under the rules of the federal farm loan board.

The loan association is required to subscribe for shares of stock ($5 shares) in the federal land bank equal in amount to its own shares of stock, and this subscription for stock in the federal land bank must accompany the other papers.

After a federal land bank has received such articles of association, with the accompanying affidavit and stock subscription, the directors of said federal land bank are required by law to send an appraiser to investigate the solvency and character of the applicants and the value of their lands, and to determine whether in their judgment a charter should be granted to the association. If the decision of the directors of the land bank is unfavorable the charter will be refused; if their decision is favorable the charter will be granted by the federal farm loan board, unless good cause can be shown for refusing it.

The federal land banks, it is expected, will stand ready at all times to lend money to farmers on farm-mortgage security. The interest charges will not be more than 6 per cent. There will be no excessive commissions or bonuses. Loans will be made for periods ranging from 5 to 40 years. Annual or semi-annual installment payments on the principal will be permitted after a loan has run 5 years.

The local loan associations will improve the credit of their members and reduce the cost of loans through the performance of definite services.

The bonds issued will be secured not only by farm mortgages deposited with the land bank registrar but also by the capital and surplus of the 12 federal land banks. Both mortgages and bonds will be exempt from all forms of taxation.

The federal farm loan board of the treasury department has general charge of the system. The department of agriculture will cooperate with this board in supplying information and rendering assistance to farmers who desire to take advantage of the federal farm loan act, especially with reference to the organization of local loan associations.
