THE ROAD TO PEACE

William Jennings Bryan is a pacifist and a pacifist. Bill's notions as to the why and whereof of peace at any price have caused that gentleman and many of his loving followers no little consternation. His peace policy lost him one perfectly good job as secretary of state and put him, some say, in the political discard. Nevertheless, Bill Bryan is a thinker. When he talks peace he does so as sincerely as he talked free silver in the palmy days of long ago. And he talks peace in the eloquent English that marked him as an orator and a scholar in the good old days.

A bit of the Bryan mold is evident in the 11-year-old urchin at Oswego whose thoughts on the war inspired his pen until he wrote: "Bah! If the soldiers of all these nations would stick their guns in the mud and refuse to fight, then the big bugs would have to fight, and there would be no more war."

Something of the same tone seems to come to us from a perusal of the following from Bryan's own pen. Withal, it contains a heap of wisdom—the wisdom that has made Bryan famous and, with some, infamous within a few short years:

The people of nearly all the belligerent nations are professed followers of the "Prince of Peace, and can not therefore approve of war except as a last resort and when no other settlement is possible, and the same rule applies with even more force to the continuing of war. Those responsible for the beginning of this war could not foresee the results that have followed, while those who assume the responsibility for continuing it must do so with full knowledge of its unspeakable horrors.

The rulers of the belligerent countries deny the responsibility for this war. As they all declare that they neither began nor desired it, we must assume that they do not desire to continue it. After an unparalleled expenditure of money and an unprecedented sacrifice of the lives of the best and bravest of their subjects, they must earnestly desire the war to end. Why, then, do they not definitely state the terms upon which the restoration of peace is possible? Why do they, by delay take upon themselves the responsibility for prolonging this carnival of blood and passion? They must know what they are fighting for, and the ends which they are not ashamed to make known to the world. Why do they not inform the public? A clear and detailed statement of the ends which they expect to secure by force of arms will be equivalent to a statement of the terms upon which they are willing to agree to peace.

Honesty and frankness are virtues which are appreciated in international affairs as well as among individuals, and the rulers at war should be willing to make a simultaneous statement of the terms of peace, but if any of them refuse to join in a simultaneous statement, those who are willing to state terms will deserve the greater credit. A statement by one side would in all probability compel a statement by the other side, and these statements, when made, would doubtless result in a discussion which would lead to an agreement. The terms of peace must be stated eventually; why not now? As all the rulers engaged in this war shrink from the responsibility for beginning it, each should desire the honor of bringing it to an end.

The world is praying for peace. May the Heavenly Father inspire the sovereigns of the belligerent nations to vie with each other for the undying fame which those will win who lead the world out of this dark night of force and hatred into the light of that day when enduring peace can be built upon love and brotherhood.

THE FRAILER SEX

The somewhat obsolete custom of referring to woman as the frailer sex is given another blow by new government statistics, which show that in this country women live on an average a trifle more than three years longer than men. These are the first figures of this kind the government ever has compiled, and although they are similar to those tabulated by the larger life insurance companies they are considerably more complete, covering as they do, the entire population, instead of a group of insurance policy holders.

The average woman, assuming that there is such a person, can expect to live 53.2 years says the Spokesman-Review. A man's expectation of life is not quite 50 years. White men live longer than negroes, rural residents can count on seven more years of life than city dwellers, and there are other variations from the grand average. It may be pointed out that the figures on which the government report is based are taken almost entirely from states on the Atlantic seaboard. It would be interesting to see if the west, with its more equable climate and absence of congested city slum districts, would not show a much better average of longevity.

It appears that the longer life of women is in a great degree due to the fact that men are more likely to meet violent deaths. Nearly four-fifths of homicides, suicides and fatal accidents are of men. Besides, girl babies appear to have a stronger hold on life than boy babies, and are not so susceptible to infantile ailments.

From the government report it is apparent that there is still much to be done to check the great waste of infant life. The efforts of medical science to stop this continual waste are showing good results, but it is still true that of 100,000 native white boy babies nearly 5 per cent die during the first month and 12.6 per cent during the first year.

A SCURVY TRICK

By ways that are dark and tricks that are vain George A. White, adjutant general of the Oregon National guard, and pro tempore captain of a cavalry troop on the Mexican border, has accomplished the banishment of Colonel Cleland McLoughlin, commander of the Third infantry, O. N. G. Colonel McLoughlin, a captain in the regular army succeeded to the command of the Oregon infantry troops upon the retirement of a few years ago of Colonel Charles H. Martin, a regular army major. The former has been an efficient officer and a wonderful soldier. How good he was is evidenced by the fact that a great mass of Oregon citizens objected to his retirement under the rules of the so-called Manchú law, which allows an army officer just so much detached duty.

But politics rankled in the breast of the great George White, installed in the office of adjutant general by Governor Withycombe in part payment of his political debt to the Oregonian, of which White was a favored employee. Politics picks strange bedfellows we are told, and oftentimes these bedfellows are not to the liking of politics. Therefore, politics divorced itself from its bedfellow by tricks that are dark and ways that are vain.

Upon the request of Oregon citizens the Manchú law was about to be set aside by the war department in the case of Colonel McLoughlin. But the vigilant George was on deck and his way finally was decided upon at Washington.

Colonel McLoughlin received notable praise when he completed the mobilization of the Oregon state troops among the first in the nation and he went to the front as their leader. After a few short weeks in command of the troops the colonel is to be relieved. Can it be that the Oregonian-Withycombe George can expect the honor of promotion to the colonelcy? Impossible! Such an action would be the cause of a prompt mutiny in the Oregon ranks. Meanwhile we pass the palm to Governor Withycombe for his admirable selection of an adjutant general so versed in the ways of politics as to accomplish the defeat of so capable a man as Colonel McLoughlin.

PRESS FREEDOM

Legislation, state or national, which affects the freedom of the press usually fails of enactment these days and at such times that it really is passed has a mighty hard time to get on the statute books. Generally, too, the life of such laws or amendments to present laws is not long. The laws are either repealed by wiser heads or they are amended so as to make adverse effect upon newspapers negligible. For the past few weeks congress has been debating an amendment to present newspaper laws which would put in the hands of the postmaster general the power of decision in the matter of distribution, or, rather, means of distribution, for newspapers, magazines and other publications. The amendment, if passed, would give the postmaster general the right to decide which publications shall go by freight and which by faster means of transportation.

Such power in the hands of the head of the postal department could be used for selfish ends, and the newspapers and magazines were quick to see the danger. A vigorous protest followed, and the matter has been laid before congress in its true light.

Fortunately there are in congress a number of newspaper publishers who can always be relied upon to come to the aid of the fraternity.

They have done so in this instance, with the result that the proposed amendment has been shorn of its dangers and with the further and greater result that it will further safeguard the freedom of the press.

HETTY GREEN

No, Hetty Green was not the wealthiest woman. She merely had the most money. There are a great many women who wouldn't sell their youth, or their prettiness, or the noisiest, or the kickiest baby alive, or even a husband, for all that Hetty Green had. It is often said, by people with money, that no one would envy the rich if it were generally known what they had to endure. Most rich people belie the saying by riding in expensive automobiles, wearing strange clothes, living in great houses, employing hordes of servants, and acting as though they really believed that there was something unusually fine about them. But Hetty Green made no such pretensions. Being enormously rich, in the money sense, she was sincere enough to be, at least appear, unhappy. The natural impulse was to be sorry for Hetty Green. Some day, perhaps, we will be sorry for all rich people, and then it will be just a few steps until we arrive at the millennium.—Bulletin.

Have our republican friends given up tariff agitation as a means of stopping the wave of prosperity?

The veritable grandsire of all miracles—Taft, Roosevelt, Penrose, Smoot, Gallinger, Murray, Crane and Hughes "in complete accord."

Some of our republican friends may find it objectionable, but nevertheless "Help Mexico" is a much better policy than "Shoot Mexico."

If we mean to support the liberty and independence which has cost us so much blood and treasure to establish we must drive far away the demon of party spirit and local reproach.—George Washington.

In his Fourth of July Speech Mr. Hughes said "quiet men, not noisy men" represent "what we mean by Americanism." Is it possible he was drawing an odious comparison as between himself and T. R. as exponents of true Americanism?

I am willing, no matter what my personal fortunes may be, to play for the verdict of mankind. Personally, it will be a matter of indifference to me what the verdict on the 7th of November is, provided I feel any degree of confidence that when a later jury sits, I shall get their judgment in my favor. Not in my favor personally—what difference does that make?—but in my favor as an honest and conscientious spokesman of a great nation.

Woodrow Wilson.

SEEN FROM THE
OPTIMIST'S TOWER

The Optimist is the man who gets rich making lemonade from the lemons his enemies hand him.

The Eugene "Register" registers the information that two tiny spotted fawns have been born at the McKenzie fish hatchery. Poor little suckers! This conclusively demonstrates the Darwinian theory of evolution.

The same paper boasts inordinately over a vetch which is seven feet long. Oregon City is the possessor of a bunch of thistles eleven feet long, raised without cultivation on the William Lillie farm on the Clackamas bottoms.

The McMinnville Telephone Register chronicles a pathetic little poem entitled:

"Just stand and watch yourself go by."

The galoot who can do that is on a par with the chap who fell and stepped on the back of his neck; or with the woman who seriously injured herself between the cellar and the pantry. It would be a pretty comforting experience, though, if one could reverse levers and do it after stepping upon a banana peel on a crowded street.

The Albany Democrat remarks that "Income taxes collected in Oregon for the year just closed were $118,437, as against $123,306 for the previous

"Beer—General Support with a chance to pass * * * General advocacy of the bill to date seems to be by people who would like to have supplies more convenient, especially in warm weather." We would respectfully submit that the Hon. W. S. U'Ren, late Probi candidate for governor, was one of the big signers of this initiative. We would also submit that there is only about one general for each three or four thousand privates. Consequently while the generals are sitting behind a stump someone filling up on the amber damnation that made Milwaukee infamous the rest of us will be busy putting this measure where the Alabamians consigned Kansas. He sold all he had and bought land in the "Sunflower state" just before the grasshoppers struck it. For three years the little green pest ate him out of everything he had, and he flitted back to the Southland. A few days after his departure a neighbor noticed something posted on the door of his deserted shanty, and going to where he could read it, he found this touching little poem:

"Fare thee well, dear Kansas, I bid thee a fond adieu;

Perhaps I may go down to hell, But I'll never come back to you."

Laying all joking aside, the principal animus of the Beer amendment is beautifully described in the lines of the great American poet Longfellow (or was it Bill Nye?)

"Hush, little drug store, don't you cry;

You'll be a grogshop by and by."

Portland Entertains Buyers

"Buyers' Week" at Portland is scheduled for August 7 to 12 this year.

It is an event that is regarded as of unusual importance to the business men of the Northwest, and for the fourth annual event has won the voluntary endorsement of the president of the Oregon Retail Merchants association. President G. C. Barlow has sent out a letter to every member of that organization, urging his attendance on Buyers' week. He points out that the occasion is one that is of equal value with the annual meetings of the association.

At meetings of the association the members listen to papers and discussions on merchandising. As usual, Portland will this year refund the railroad fare of every merchant who purchases goods amounting to $500 or more. Take a receipt for your railroad fare when you pay it. Buy one way at full fare. Validated receipt will secure return ticket at one-third regular fare.

McMAUGH'S STATEMENT
Elderly Oswego Man Corrects What
He Says Are Untruthful Stories

Mr. McMaugh's case has been aired in justice and circuit courts in this county until it is familiar history to most people. Yet, with the following advertisement the old gentleman revises his unpleasant memories in an effort to correct what he considers an erroneous statement of the facts harbored by some of his friends. His invalid daughter, Minnie, aged 35, has disappeared from his home and Mr. McMaugh submits the following signed advertisement for the enlightenment of his friends:

"I did not leave home because my son, Ethan, and daughter, Ida, failed to provide for me, but because of their brutality and attempts to take my life. They attempted to throw me on a hot stove and then told that I had 'kind of a fit,' probably out of anger because I did not give them a quit claim deed to my property, which I turned over to them that they would provide for Minnie and me. They told many falsehoods about me to the neighbors and the court and would not permit my evidence to be heard in court. They have now stolen my invalid daughter, for whom I had made provision. I am her father, why should they shut her away from me? They frightened this invalid until she would hide from me in fear. Needs to my recorder's office if anyone wishes to see how Minnie was provided for."
