CHAPTER VI.

The Quest Begins.

When O'Reilly had finished his second reading of the letter there were fresh blots upon the pitifully untidy pages. "I write nicely, only the ink is poor—" "There is little of anything latte at Asensio's house—" "It is cold ... the dawn—" . . . Poor little Vic! He had always thought of her as proud, so high-spirited, so plucky, but another Rosa had written this letter. Her appeal stirred every chord of tenderness, every impulse of chivalry in his impressionable Irish nature. "O God! Come quickly, if you love me." He leaped to his feet; he dashed the tears from his eyes.

Johnnie's preparations were conducted with vigor and promptitude; within two hours his belongings were packed. He seized his hat and hastened downtown to the office of the Cuban junta.

A businesslike young man inquired his errand. Johnnie made known a part of it, and then asked to see someone in authority. In consequence, perhaps, of his Irish smile or of that persuasiveness which he could render almost irresistible when he willed, it was not long before he gained admittance to the presence of Mr. Enriquez, a distinguished, scholarly Cuban of middle age.

O'Reilly plunged boldly into the heart of the matter which had brought him thither. When he had finished his tale Mr. Enriquez inquired:

"But how do you expect me to help you?"

"I want your advice more than your help, although you might tell me where I can find Colonel Lopez."

Enriquez eyed his caller keenly. "That information would be very well worth having," said he. "But, you understand, we know little about what is going on in Cuba—far less than the Spaniards themselves. I'm afraid I can't help you."

He Sat Silently While the Letter Was Being Read.

"You don't take me for a spy, do you?" Johnnie asked, with his friendly grin.

"Ah! You don't look like one, but we never know whom to trust. This young lady in whom you are interested, who is she?"

"Her name is Varona; Miss Rosa Varona."

"So?" Enriquez raised his brows. "Not by any chance the heiress to that famous Varona treasure?"

"Exactly!—If there is such a thing. Here! Read this. I want you to believe me." Reverently he laid Rosa's letter before her countryman. "I'm not in the habit of showing my letters to strangers, but—I guess that'll convince you I'm not a spy."

He sat silently while the letter was being read; nor was he disappointed in the result. Mr. Enriquez raised dark, compassionate eyes to his, saying:

"This is a touching letter, sir. I thank you for allowing me to see it. No, I don't doubt you now. Poor Cuba! Her sons must be brave, her daughters patient."

"Well! You understand why I must go quickly, and why I can't chance delay by going either to Matanzas or to Havana. I want to land somewhere farther east, and I want you to help me to find Colonel Lopez."

Mr. Enriquez frowned thoughtfully. "What I just told you is literally true," he said at last. "We work in the dark up here, and we don't know the whereabouts of our troops. But—I have a thought." He excused himself and left the room. When he returned he explained: "I don't have to tell you that we are watched all the time, and that for us to assist you openly would be liable to defeat your purpose. But I have just telephoned to a man I can trust, and I have told him your story. He has relatives in Cuba and he agrees to help you if he can. His name is Alvarado." Writing an address upon a card, he handed it to O'Reilly. "Go to him, tell him what you have told me, don't return here unless it is necessary; otherwise when you land in Cuba you may have cause to regret it."

Doctor Alvarado, a high type of the Cuban professional man, was expecting O'Reilly. He listened patiently to his caller's somewhat breathless recital.

"You do well to avoid the cities where you are known," he agreed. "But just how to reach the insurrectos—"

"If you'd merely give me a letter saying I'm a friend—"

The doctor promptly negatived this suggestion. "Surely you don't think it can be done as easily as that?" he inquired. "In the first place, wherever you land, you will be watched and probably searched. Such a letter, if discovered, would not only end your chances, but it would bring certain disaster upon those to whom it was written. My two brothers, Tomas and Ignacio, reside in Cuba, and we all work for the cause of independence in our own ways. I am fortunately situated, but they are surrounded by dangers, and I must ask you to be extremely careful in communicating with them, for I am placing their lives in your hands and—I love them dearly."

"I shall do exactly as you say."

"Very well, then! Go to Neuvitas, where Tomas lives—there is a steamer leaving in three or four days, and you can arrange passage on her. He is a dentist. Meet him, somehow, and make yourself know by repeating this sentence: 'I come from Felipe. He told me how you whipped him to keep him from going to the Ten Years' war!' That will be enough; he will ask you who you are and what you want. You won't need to say anything more. No living soul, except Tomas and I, knows that he thrashed me, but it is true. He will understand from the message that I trust you, and he will help you to reach the rebels, if such a thing is possible. Come and see me when you get back, and bring me news of Tomas. Now, adios, compadre."

"Adios, senor! I am deeply grateful!"

O'Reilly had no difficulty in securing passage direct to Neuvitas on the English steamer Dunham Castle, and a few days later he saw the Atlantic highlands dissolve into the mists of a winter afternoon as the ship headed outward into a nasty running sea.

Cuba, when it came fairly into sight, lay bathed in golden sunshine, all warmth and welcome, like a bride upon an azure couch. The moist breath from her fragrant shores swept over the steamer's decks and Johnnie O'Reilly sniffed it joyfully.

Although there were but a few passengers on the Dunham Castle, they were subjected to a long delay, during which suspicious customs men searched their baggage and questioned them. Finally, however, O'Reilly found himself free to go ashore.

El Gran Hotel Europea, Neuvitas' leading hostelry, belied its name. It was far from large, and certainly it was anything but European, except, perhaps, in its proprietor's extravagant and un-American desire to please, at any cost. But it was the best hotel the place afforded, and Senor Carbajal was the most attentive of hosts.

He evinced an unusual interest in the affairs of his American guest, and soon developed a habit of popping into the latter's room at unexpected moments, ostensibly to see that all was as it should be. When, for the third time, he appeared without knocking, O'Reilly suspected something.

"You have everything, eh?" Mr. Carbajal teetered upon the balls of his feet while his small black eyes roved inquisitively.

"Everything in abundance."

"You are a pleasure traveler? You see the sights, is that it? Well, Cuba is beautiful."

"I'm not a tourist. I travel for my health," said O'Reilly.

"You— Health—!" Carbajal's frame began to heave; his bulging abdomen oscillated as if shaken by some hidden hand. "Good! Ha! There's another joke for you."

"I'm a sick man," O'Reilly insisted, hollowly.

"You don't look sick," mumbled Carbajal. "Not like the other American."

"What other American?"

"A peculiar fellow. He went on to Puerto Principe. What a cough! And he was as thin as a wire. He bled at the mouth, too, all the time, when he was not reviling my hotel. You'll see him if you go there, provided he hasn't come apart with his coughing. I believe he writes for newspapers. Well, it is my pleasure to serve you. Command me at any hour." Mr. Carbajal rose reluctantly and went wheezing downstairs to his grimy tables and the flies.

WASHINGTON, April 21.—Steps looking to early determination of the government's authority under the joint resolution of congress by which control of the railroads and telephone systems of the country was taken over, to fix intrastate rates, were taken today by the supreme court in agreeing to expedite consideration of test cases brought under the resolution. The court fixed May 5 for hearing arguments, and final decisions before the court adjourns

RING FOR FRANCES

By MARGARET I. FEELEY.

(Copyright, 1919, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

Frances K—— simply detested her alarm clock. Every morning it brought her back from dreams of green fields and babbling brooks to brick tenement houses and city noises. Furthermore, it impressed on her that R—— & Co. expected every clerk behind the counter at 8:30 sharp.

Although the mirror said her face was getting thinner, Frances blamed it on the new style of hairdressing. In another ten days she would have her week's vacation, while afternoons in the park would soon put the color in her cheeks again, she told herself.

She wondered if David B——, the new manager, noticed. Frances smiled afterwards. Just as if he could keep track of a half thousand salesgirls' tired looks.

Supposing he did ask her to share his umbrella to the elevated station the last rainy evening—it merely showed he was a gentleman. Nevertheless, she knew she was about the last girl to leave the store.

"Guess you'll have to set your alarm clock a little earlier," was Mrs. H——'s greetings as Frances came down late to breakfast.

Scarcely ten minutes after her arrival at the store, David B—— approached the counter. "Miss K——," he said, "we are having a special sale on alarm clocks today. Miss M—— is out sick. Will you please take charge?" Frances had no recollection of replying. She next remembered B—— explaining how to regulate the clock, and try her utmost she could not keep the flaming color from her cheeks.

All that morning she wound and rewound the alarm device for prospective customers until now it seemed as if her head would burst with pain from listening to the ringing.

For lunch she had an ice cream, hardly nourishing to a tired clerk.

During the afternoon how her head throbbed. Would the public ever stop buying alarm clocks? "Yes'm," Frances remembered saying, "this alarm rings every 30 seconds, then stops, then rings"—how warm everything seemed, the store was getting dark. It's funny the lights are out, didn't the alarm sound far away— and then—total darkness. She thought she heard David B——'s voice, but oh, so faintly.

Frances opened her eyes in a room she had often read about, a room that existed for her only in story books—cretonne curtains, a little enameled bed, cool white paper and a nurse. Surely, this was a dream. The nurse explained that R—— & Co. had reserved a room at the hospital for any of their clerks who might become ill. This was news indeed, for the firm never had the reputation of being over kind-hearted.

When she next awoke it was early evening, while the corridor lights accentuated the growing darkness of her room. Suddenly, the smart trim figure of the nurse appeared in the doorway, followed by David B——. Frances was conscious that he was standing by her bedside. Slowly she opened her eyes, while the nurse switched on the lights.

"It was nice of you to come, Mr. B——," she began. "I am very thankful to the firm, also." With a nod B—— dismissed the nurse.

"Miss K.," he said in a low modulated voice, "I'm awfully sorry I put you on that alarm clock counter, but I didn't know you weren't feeling well."

Frances smiled faintly. "It was foolish of me," she began, but B—— interrupted.

"Please let us not talk about that now," he said, "but after a little while I hope you'll be well enough to go down and stay with my mother. Our home is much too large for the two of us, besides—a rest would—"

"Oh, but I couldn't, Mr. B——; —you see, I—I—"

"Now, I know you are going to say you don't know me, but you do, although you've long forgotten."

"Are you sure?" Frances inquired, her voice trembling.

"Am I sure?" B—— answered. "I'm going to tell you something, then you may decide for yourself."

"You remember John M—— in Northwood?"

Frances nodded.

"He was my uncle," B—— continued, "and one summer along about five years ago I went down to visit him on his farm. He was a pretty cranky sort of a fellow, but good hearted, just the same. There was a family down the road who used to supply him with milk. A little dark-haired girl used to deliver it every morning. One morning she was late. He was terribly cranky; he told her that she ought to buy an alarm clock to wake her up. In her haste and confusion she dropped the milk. I felt sorry, but I knew my uncle's disposition, so I had to keep still. I left the next day, but I found out her name. When I came back the next year she had left the village.

"I didn't suppose you'd remember me, but I wanted to make sure. I guess you didn't understand, because you never mentioned it the night you walked under my umbrella, but somehow or other I didn't forget. I've been waiting for just the proper time to tell you and I hope you won't think I'm taking an advantage, but I've just got to tell you—you'll come, Frances, won't you?"

Frances' lips quivered.

"I will—if—if—"

"If what?" broke in B——.

"If you don't have alarm clocks."

Socialists Work for Debs' Release

AS UNCLE SAM WOULD GARDEN

USEFUL IDEAS HELP GET GARDEN RESULTS

Where the garden is handled in an intensive manner, there are a number of facilities that may be provided without much extra cost, but which reduce the work of caring for the crops.

For instance, by providing supports for certain crops about double the number of plants can be grown on a given area, it is pointed out by specialists of the United States Department of Agriculture.

Certain varieties of early peas do not necessarily have to be provided with brush or any kind of support to climb upon, but they will do better and yield more if given a support. With the later peas of the telephone or tall-growing variety it is essential that they be given something to climb upon. Brush, if brush can be procured for this purpose, should be on hand and ready for use when the peas are planted.

Substitutes for Brush

As a rule, brush cannot be secured in town, so it will be necessary to use some other form of support. Wire poultry netting 18 to 24 inches in width probably is the most desirable support that can be procured, but it is expensive, and a very satisfactory support can be made of cheap twine and a few stakes to string it on. In the case of one of the boys' club gardens, the boys did not have the money to buy netting, so they went to a place where refuse from the city was dumped and secured a number of broom handles and enough discarded bale wire to form a very satisfactory trellis upon which the peas were trained.

Tomatoes trained to a single stem and tied to stakes not only ripen their fruits earlier than those left upon the ground, but the fruits themselves are of better flavor; and, because they are held off the ground they are cleaner and more convenient for gathering. By pruning and tying to stakes a much larger number of plants can be placed on a given area. Also plants, such as lettuce, early cabbage, radishes, and beets, can be grown in the spaces between the tomato plants.

Many people prefer the bush type of Lima beans to the pole varieties, because no poles are required for the bush kinds. It has been found, however, that under most circumstances the pole Lima beans are preferable because they can be trained on strings or wires attached to a fence or, in case the fence is of wire, the beans can be trained on the fence itself. By the use of poles or a trellis of strings or wire the beans are carried up off the ground and occupy less space than do those of the bunch varieties. The same is true of a number of garden crops.

Vine Crops on Fences

If the garden is small and there is not room to grow the vine crops on the ground, they may be trained to the south side of a fence or even up on the side of a building, so that they really occupy very little of the actual garden space. Where it is desired to have some kind of a screen or shade over the back porch, there is nothing better than pole Lima beans, as they form a perfect screen that will last throughout the summer and at the same time give a supply of fresh beans for the table. A little study of the habits of the various crops will enable one so to arrange the garden as to get the maximum production without sacrificing quality or convenience in its cultivation.

By proper arrangement of rows and the grouping of crops of similar nature, the work of caring for the garden is greatly reduced. For instance, all such crops as carrots, parsnips, salsify, onions, beets, and turnips, that require very little space between the rows should be grouped in one part of the garden. Those that grow larger should be given another place and those that cast considerable shade should be placed at the north side of the garden, where they will not shade the small crops.

Making Watering Easy

Another special facility for the garden consists of a line of perforated pipe that may be attached to the hose and used to irrigate the crops. Where the land is nearly level, watering can be done very conveniently by discharging the hose into small furrows alongside the rows and irrigating the crops by the flooding or furrow system. Wherever the land is steep or uneven, the line of perforated pipe will distribute the water to better advantage. This can be used where a water supply is available, and it is doubtful if it would pay where special pumping arrangements are necessary in order to provide the water. In sections where irrigation must be depended upon entirely for growing crops, special arrangements for getting water upon the garden must be made. Last year a great many farmers of the irrigated sections provided special facilities for watering their gardens.

BOY SCOUTS

(Conducted by National Council of the Boy Scouts of America.)

SCOUTS AS "NUT PATRIOTS"

The boy is coming into his own. Every human boy always knew deep within his heart that he was the natural keeper of the peace, the very present help in time of trouble, but the difficulty lay in convincing his elders.

The boy scout movement was his first great opportunity for demonstration, and he seized it. Under its beneficent rays his natural inclination and operations emerged from the black shadow of paternal disapproval or lack of interest and assumed their deserved place.

Swimming, woodcraft and camping became dignified professions, in the pursuit of which the boy himself was made strong and thereby fitted to defend the weak.

His value as a part of civic life next became apparent, and he distributed important literature, helped care for the crowds at parades and public meetings, learned to observe city laws and traffic regulations and to encourage their observance in others.

Having borne himself worthily in all these matters, behold his just reward! No more did the boy need to ask fearfully if he might go nutting. His country called him, he must go. Gathering nuts for gas masks was recognized by the highest authorities as an essential industry. But the boy knew it all the time.

SCOUT'S LIFE FOR ALLIES.

In the death of Denwood W. Newbury, age seventeen years, in a lumber camp on Mount Spokane there passed a boy who, disappointed that he was too young to enter the army, had done all he could to aid the causes of the allies to prove he was not a slacker, and who had striven to live up to the principles he had learned as a boy scout.

He was intensely interested in the war, and had contributed from his fund, the Armenian relief, and had invested in War stamps and bought a Liberty bond. At the camp he collected $64 from the men for the Red Cross. He had been a member of the boy scouts in California, where we lived before going to Spokane two years ago, and his efforts were along the line of making a good record for the scout service.

SCOUTS A NATIONAL FACTOR.

"War has certainly brought to the boy scout movement great opportunities," says Milton A. McRae of San Diego, Cal. "We have had some loss, but I believe a much greater gain, and the publicity that the movement is receiving in America is a wonderful asset, and really beyond comprehension.

"I marched for two and a half miles in a great parade at the head of the San Diego council and the boy scouts, and I am certain that I did not misinterpret the cheers and plaudits of the thousands of spectators who lined the streets while the procession passed by. The boy scout movement is a factor in this nation."
