HIGH TREASON

In these strenuous days of border scares and military mobilization, court martials would be greatly in order to deal with some of the evidences of high treason that are developing in those whose patriotism is so deeply immersed in the sanguinary battle for money that it can only find the light of day through such idiotic and treasonable utterances as those of our contemporary, The Enterprise.

The call to arms has brought a united mass of the best blood of the nation to the protection of the flag. The order of President Wilson has called to the colors tens of thousands of the best men the nation has to offer. Democracy and republicanism has so intermixed in the crisis that is presented by eminent war that there seems to be but a faint dividing line. To a man the country responds to the spirit of the call, if not to the service incident thereto.

Notwithstanding these things we find The Enterprise filling up its waste space with such treasonable utterances as this: "And in cursing the Mexicans remember the democrats." If that is not high treason then old Noah Webster was asleep when he compiled our dictionary. The Enterprise would have you curse the man who leads a nation today. It would have you denounce your brother, your sister, perhaps your father and mother because of their political complexion. There are many families in Clackamas county in which political divisions exist. There are republicans who are brothers to democrats, democratic fathers whose sons are republicans, yet they are asked to curse their kin. They are asked to renounce allegiance to the president, no matter who he be so long as he be democratic, and thereby to denounce the flag that waves above the head of the chief executive, regardless of all except that he is a democrat.

Hardly a day does this treasonable sheet put its muddled foot into the brightness of life that some high treason does not find expression. It is sad, since war seems to be upon us, that martial law is not declared, if for no other reason than that the military authorities would curb the anti-American utterances of such rabid political fans as is The Enterprise, a duty which civil authorities seem to shun.

If the entire republican party, with its many newspaper spokesmen, attempted to build up its life tissue with such rapid treason as that of The Enterprise, denouncing kith, kin, president and flag, the republican party couldn't elect a chief of police in Stringtown. Thankfully, however, the blood of true Americanism runs in most republican veins and we can rely upon the mass of these partisans to be loyal to the stars and stripes and to their own homes regardless of the man in the presidential chair.

MAN AND STATESMAN

If you, Mr. Merchant, Farmer, Manufacturer, had an employee who had proved his worth to your business beyond any doubt by his close adherence to the duties outlined for him; by his progressive methods and his loyalty to your business, would you consider discharging him for the simple reason that he happened to be of a different religious belief or because, perchance, he was of a different breed politically?

The Courier knows your answer, and you know that such a circumstance is exactly that presented by the present national political situation. You, no matter what your business be, would not consider the discharge of a capable employee because he was of a contrasting political color. If you are sensible there is slight reason for your voting against President Woodrow Wilson for re-election. You know, whether your political inclinations will allow you to express the knowledge or not, that Mr. Wilson has been the greatest statesman in the national government since the days of Abraham Lincoln. You know that he has faced more trying conditions than have been presented to this nation since the civil war, and you know that he has handled every obligation of his office with discretion, honesty and diplomacy.

Mr. Wilson has not been a bulldozer, yet no one has dared to say that he has been weak-kneed. Mr. Wilson's political and private life is and has been beyond the slightest reproach. An error here and there stands a towering monument to the humanity of the man and as a strong tribute to the statesman who has steered the ship of state into channels of national honor and international prestige within the three years that he has been at the helm.

When you change gears at the foot of the hill your machine crawls along slowly, many times unable to make the incline. You know that Woodrow Wilson has climbed the hills built of the million obstacles placed in his way. You know that as a man, a statesman, a patriot and as president of the United States, his career has been one of greater credit, in the face of conditions presented, than any since the days when the nation was in its infancy. The nation does not want to change gears at the foot of the political hill in November. It wants to avoid that awful incline, that uncertainty that rests in the selection of a new leader for national affairs. In fact the nation wants to avoid the hill altogether and to roll along the broad highway of progress toward the goal that is before it; a goal marked with honor and humanity to mankind and with peace and dignity to nations.

The Courier predicts the re-election of Woodrow Wilson to the presidency, not alone because of his remarkable record at Washington, but because of his sterling character and statesmanship. His majority will be large. You will be asked to vote for Woodrow Wilson in November. Will you be one of that majority? If you ponder upon the fitness of things and upon Mr. Wilson's record we predict that you will be.

THE CALL TO ARMS

With the sounding of the stirring notes of the call to arms the state of Oregon has been aroused. Smooth shaven youth has responded to the summons, prepared for what may come and patriotism has been at a high pitch throughout the week. The magic of patriotism has found its resting place in the hearts of more than a thousand young men and great respect to the flag has not been known in a decade.

There is no great possibility that the troops of the Oregon National guard will proceed beyond the concentration camp at Clackamas. But the show of spirit is not altered because of that. War may come at any moment and the valor of the youth of the country stands ready to face eventualities with its life if need be. But the display of patriotism and courage of the young men of today is not the only feature of the sudden mobilization. At the armory in this city during the several days of mobilization have been many men as witnesses of the preparation for departure to unknown soil. These are the men who answered the call of the civil war and the call of '98. They are the men who know war from intimate contact with its awfulness, and they have been keen observers of the movement of troops which supplant them in protecting the flag.

Grizzled veterans, tottering on to the happy valley where war is unknown, cheer, with weakened voice and with life and drum, the youngsters who will man the guns of death. Younger men see enacted before them again the courageous scenes of the days of '98, a living drama from the past, when home and comfort were foreseen for the cause of honorable service.

The drama is written in valor. It is an object lesson to the younger boys of the land and it is a sermon to parents. This is no time for unpatriotic sentiment; no time for quibbling, and the mothers and fathers, otherwise able to care for themselves, who refuse their sons permission to take up arms in protection of the flag that shelters them are hardly entitled to citizenship.

All the glory of the days of '98 has returned to us. The youth that fought valorously a score of years ago is represented by the youth of another generation, and these will acquire themselves as honorably as did their fathers. If the lads are ordered to duty they will go with the God speed of a nation of patriots; with the blessing of a nation whose whole heart is in the welfare of its citizens and whose flag is the emblem of the greatest brotherhood that mankind has ever known.

THE FRIARS' CLUB

With the vivacious vituperation that flows from his educated pen, Hugh Hume of the Portland Spectator, takes a furious straight-arm jab at the Friars' club, that den made famous by the iniquity that rests in human minds and hearts and which, in the palmy days of liquor and moral corruption, was a thorn in the side of law and order. But Mr. Hume has overlooked a point that makes his attack untimely.

The Friars' club is no more. In its place, white-washed, regenerated and inhabited with a newer, different glory than was ever thought possible, is Friars' park. There came that time in the life of the notorious club when the best of friends had to part. The club threw off its vestment of scandal and crime soon after the passage of the prohibition statute. Crime without liquor does not pay, and without liquor the club was a drugless fiend.

White-wash has covered up the traces left upon the place by the evil that had been done within its walls. Swings for the children, swimming tanks, a dancing pavilion, merry-go-rounds, boating and a bathing beach, and best of all, goats and burros for the children to ride, have taken the place of the criminal pleasures of other days. Upon the lasting quality of the paint and trimmings that cover the signs of the old days Clackamas county depends for relief from the menace of the Friars' club, and bids honest welcome to Friars' park, where children, free from the cares that made the club a pesthouse for those of their elders who were sick of mind and heart, romp gleefully in the shade of tall firs and swing merrily in the brisk breezes from the pretty river.

There are no sentries at the doors and gates today. A welcome to pleasant outing is the only guard at the portals, and an innocent mantle covers the pesthouse that was that very thing in every sense. Meanwhile, Clackamas county officers sleep with one eye open. Such a sudden transition is as remarkable as it is gratifying and, although there is slight fear of such a thing, the white-wash and the innocent mantle are being tested for their moral lasting qualities. If they prove resistant to the crime that is written upon the walls; if they preserve the community against an outcropping of the shame for which the club was once a residence, then Mr. Wilbur, the manager, is to be congratulated for having seen the light and for doing the right thing.

While the Friars' club remains the Friars' park it is welcome in our midst.

THE MULE OR THE GIRL?

Although it may be slightly out of place in editorial columns the pertinent story told by the Indianapolis Record is interesting and highly suggestive of a sad condition in the social scale of a great nation. A nation great because dollars and common sense are elements out of harmony and because humanity itself is often sacrificed in the everlasting battle for money. However, the following story has a human note that entitles it to careful consideration:

John Jones, farmer, went to his barn one morning and found there a brand new mule colt. He raised it until it was 3 years when $200 was offered for it. Instead of selling it, he rented it to the city of Indianapolis for 85 cents a day, including board, stall, shoeing and medical attendance. The mule worked 250 days the first year, earning $212.50, or $200 net after taxes, etc., were paid. Mr. Jones bought another mule with the $200, which he also rented to the city and at the end of the second year he had two mules and $400 cash. He kept this up 15 years, till his first mule colt was 18 years old, at which time he owned 32,767 miles, worth an average of $100 each, or $3,276,700

The 19th year they earned him a net income of $6,553,400.

Alice Allen, daughter of Albert Allen, living across the road from John Jones, was born the same day the mule colt registered his first kick. Her father fed, clothed and educated her for 17 years at a cost of $125 a year, and then sent her to business college for a year at an expense of $400, making her total cost at 18 years $2525. When she was 18 she got a situation as stenographer and office girl with an Indianapolis business house at $8 a week, paying for her own room, board, streetcar fare, shoes, doctor bills and as much clothing as what was left would permit.

All of which merely shows that some things are different from others.

INTRODUCE PARK BILL

Forest Service to Have Charge of Mt. Hood Public Park

Senator Chamberlain introduced on Tuesday the much-discussed bill proposing to create the Mount Hood National park. The bill defines by metes and bounds the tracts to be carved out of the Oregon National Forest and converted to a National park. It further provided that administration of the park shall be left in the hands of the secretary of agriculture—which means the Forest Service—and thus places the park in a class by itself, as all other national parks are under the jurisdiction of the secretary of interior.

The bill is so framed as to insure the freest use of the park for recreation purposes, having in mind the preservation and protection of all natural scenic beauties.

Representative Sinnott Tuesday introduced a bill authorizing the addition to the Whitman National Forest of all lands in T. 11 S. R. 34 E. T. 11 and 12, R. 35, T. 10, R. 35 E. and T. 10 and 11, R. 36, which are found, upon examination, to be suitable for timber growth and the protection of watersheds.

The bill also provides that persons owning lands within this forest, which are valuable for forestry purposes, may relinquish the same to the government and be given in exchange government timber equal in value to the value of the land relinquished.

Grange at Sandy Grove

The growth of the Sandy grange is proving a pleasant thing to the officers of the state and local organizations. Fourteen candidates for membership received the first and second degrees at a big meeting in the grange hall at Sandy on Saturday and a number of possible members were present. Next Saturday a team from the Lents grange will attend the meeting and at that time the third and fourth degrees will be conferred upon those who took the first and second last Saturday. The fourth degree is the last and makes of a candidate a privileged member. Many interesting meetings are in store for the members of the Sandy organization.

of Money

We are all obliged to carry with us a certain amount of money—the daily necessities of life require cash. How much you should carry is for you to say. As a rule, not more than you will need from day to day, for the man who carries great wads of money with him is not only taking the risks of theft and loss, but is doing himself, the bank and the community an injustice; himself in the risk he assumes and the loss of interest the bank would gladly pay; the bank in the use of money to its profit, and the community in the loss of the money as the foundation of credit.

In a bankless community the individual must protect his own money. And to protect it he hides it, often to his sorrow. If there were no banks we would gravitate to a state of barbarism where strength was the only safeguard. But to the individual who has more money in hand than the daily needs require, the bank says: "It is our business to protect. For this we have a strong vault and safe. We spend money to protect money. We know how—that is our function as a bank."

You will frequently read of losses running into large figures because someone has mistrusted a bank, and assumed to be his own money protector. Merchants in bankless towns are frequently robbed—so frequently that some who have learned their lesson will no longer trust the frail iron safe that looks so formidable, but is a mere toy under the craftsman's skill, and prefer to sleep on their money.

If "every man to his trade" is a good motto, then the banker to his trade, which is, first of all, to safeguard money. True, he does not keep all he receives on deposit in cash—that would be a useless and profitless task—he keeps only enough to do business with and loans the rest, which constitutes the second function of the banker, and that is to lend, but remember this: that the place for the money you can't use today is in the bank, for this is what banks are for, and you had better find it out. You will sleep better and your money will grow while you sleep.
