

THE LOCAL NEWS.

S. R. Taylor, a well known Woodburn man, was transacting business here Thursday.

Percy Cross has accepted a position in the Harding drugstore during the absence of A. B. Wilcox.

The Bible Study class of the Mountain View church will meet next week with Mrs. J. Gorbett.

Misses Alma and Florence Moore delightedly entertained the Mehr Licht Club, Wednesday evening at their home in Greenpoint. The topic of study for the evening was Africa. A delicious Dutch luncheon was served during the evening. Present were Misses Mabel Toomey, Daisy Larson, Gladys McCoy, Myrtle and Gertrude Hamilton, Mamie Burroughs, Alma and Florence Moore.

Mrs. A. L. Hickman gave a birthday surprise party at her home in Mountain View, Tuesday afternoon, in honor of Mrs. R. M. O. Brown. The afternoon was pleasantly spent in social conversation. A delicious luncheon was served by Mrs. Hickman. The following ladies were present: Mrs. Amos Harrington, Mrs. Van Dong, Mrs. J. C. Rohl, Mrs. R. M. O. Brown, Mrs. J. Lowellyn, Mrs. A. S. Gillette, Mrs. O. M. Mason, Mrs. Frank Welch, Mrs. A. L. Hickman, and Charles and Ruth Mason.

Frederick-Gerber Marriage.

A quiet wedding took place Wednesday morning, when Miss Elsie Frederick and Mr. Edwin Gerber were united in marriage by Rev. A. Hillebrand. The ceremony took place at 10:30 o'clock, at the home of Rev. A. Hillebrand. Only immediate relatives were present. Both young people are well known, and have many friends in this city. After a trip through California, they will make their home at Logan, where the groom has erected a new bungalow.

CLARKS

The snow is all gone and has left the ground filled with water.

The dogs that were killed here and at Molalla have excited the people very much. The killing of the one here was a little misapprehension. One morning Frank Reis found that one of his sheep had been killed by a cougar. He called Elbert Larkins by telephone to bring his hounds and gun. Larkins and Cummings went to Reis' place, where the three of them started with the hounds on the trail in the snow. After traveling awhile, Frank Nicholas and C. Kandle, who had been after a wildcat, heard the sound of the hounds and soon joined in the chase. While having lots of fun tracking in the snow, they heard the dog give a voice as different in tone, and of course they all knew what that meant and made a race to the tree. While within about two hundred yards of the tree, Reis said, "I see him," so they went on to the tree. Some of the boys wanted a little fun with it by shooting it with a 22 calibre rifle. Nicholas said no and killed it with his gun before the other boys got tired looking at the beast. The animal certainly belongs to the dogs for their good work. The hide will be mounted and raffled off later.

STAFFORD.

We are having good old Oregon weather again—no frost, no snow, no "nothing" but just rain and fog.

Mr. Albert Turner was reported as slightly better though he is not able to receive company as yet.

Mrs. Friedman has been very sick and under Dr. Mount's care, but is now able to walk about the room some.

Mrs. Ed Sharp and Mrs. Homer Kras occupied the same room at the hospital, where they lay for some time critically ill. Mrs. Sharp has returned home now, and Mrs. Kras is expected to be able to return to her family soon.

Little Willie Powell fell and dislocated his shoulder last week.

The Courier's description of the prize fight going on in Oregon City just touched our funny bone and together with all the neighbors we had a good laugh. Well, if your city officers and would-be officers cannot do anything but fight and furnish amusement for us outsiders, they perhaps may not have lived in vain, as it is said a good laugh prolongs the life of the average man.

QUICK RESULTS.

Little fellows that everybody reads, and that bring results.

SHE KNEW IT ALL

By HELEN WENTWORTH

Copyright by American Press Association, 1911.

When Miss Henderson went abroad her friends chaffed her in this wise:

"For mercy's sake, don't come home engaged to one of those stupid fortune hunting noblemen over there. He'll turn out a wife beater and make ducks and drakes with your money."

"Never fear," replied Miss Henderson, "that I shall be taken in, whatever I do. I am twenty-five years old, and a woman of twenty-five knows as much as she is ever going to know. I have out my wisdom teeth, I assure you."

Miss Henderson did meet a nobleman, an Italian prince. Prince Barone was not as well off as some of his countrymen of title, but he was a good fellow and much respected. He fell desperately in love with Miss Henderson. That he was what he purported to be was manifest from the fact that he was a member of the Italian legation at Paris, where he met Miss Henderson. She was not averse to marrying a prince and gave Baronetti considerable encouragement.

However, if she married him it would be without love. The anticipation of being a princess was sufficient to induce her to marry a man she only respected, and the prince had great hopes of winning her. She told him that she was going to Rome and while there she would write him her acceptance or declination of his proposition.

"You will not marry me for love," said the prince gloomily.

"Why do you say that?"

"When a woman loves a suitor she will engage herself to him first and look into his affairs and his standing afterward. You are going to Rome to look into mine. If you find them satisfactory you will accept me; if not you will reject me."

Since this was the case Miss Henderson's denial was not very effective. However, she carried out her resolution, and finding the prince's status satisfactory in every particular, wrote him that she would marry him. Later she returned to Paris, where the two made their plans for their united future. Miss Henderson was to return to America, and the prince was to follow her in the spring. After their marriage he was to resign from the diplomatic service and stand for the Italian parliament.

When Miss Henderson bade goodbye to her fiancé it was with no especial regret on her part. But she was pleased with having secured a title and one of such high degree. She had taken pains to learn all about Baronetti and, remembering what her friends had said about marrying a stupid fortune hunting nobleman, thought how she would triumph over them in announcing her betrothal to a prince.

She had not long been on the ocean before the words of Baronetti that a woman in love engages herself first and looks up her lover's standing afterward occurred to her. On the steamer was Viscount Clarence Chesley, an English nobleman, who, seeing her on deck the day after the vessel sailed, took such a violent fancy to her that he lost no time in securing a presentation.

He was a handsome man and evidently a genuine British nobleman. Miss Henderson's brother had been a great deal in England, and she had often heard him speak of Chesley. Mentioning the fact to the viscount, he said at once:

"Bob Henderson. I knew him well. The last meeting we had in England was at the Ascot races. I remember it very well, since I borrowed a hundred pounds of him to back the favorite. I won, and we had a champagne supper in the evening to celebrate the event."

Miss Henderson was much pleased that her brother should have been so honored. It was an eight day trip, short, but long enough for Miss Henderson to forget her Italian lover and give her heart to Chesley. He proposed to her. She gave him an evasive answer, intending to write Baronetti that she had decided that she could not love him and must break the engagement.

Upon the arrival of the steamer Chesley saw Miss Henderson to her carriage. He told her that he would not be able to visit her for a week or two, since he was going to Ottawa to see his special friend, the governor general of Canada. The viscount was looking about him nervously and just before he closed the door handed the lady a gold headed cane, saying:

"Give that to Bob, with my compliments, and tell him I'll see him soon."

Miss Henderson was driven off, but the carriage was stopped at the end of the dock. A custom house officer opened the door and said:

"I'll trouble you for that cane."

Astonished, Miss Henderson gave it to him. He shook it out, and hearing some rattle within, unscrewed the head and poured out a handful of diamonds.

"That cane, miss," he said, "was given you by Billy Mudge, one of the sharpest diamond smugglers in England or America. We were telegraphed that he was coming and have been on the lookout for him."

"He is Viscount Chesley," gasped Miss Henderson, "and knows my brother."

"He was a tenant on the Chesley estates and may have met your brother, but not as an equal."

Miss Henderson never mentioned this episode and is now Princess Baronetti.

Next, but Not Proximate. "The daintiest and most particular customer I have," said the wainwright, "is a well known gambler."

"I've always heard," remarked the contemplative boarder, after a long pause, "that cleanliness is next to godliness, but sometimes it's a very bad second."—Chicago Tribune.

Sure Thing. "Do you know of any really good way to break a man of smoking in the house?"

"Certainly. Let his wife buy his cigars."—Baltimore American.

MILL DISTRICT PUT UNDER MARTIAL LAW

Massachusetts Woolen Mills Scene of Rioting When Operatives Strike.

Lawrence, Mass.—Eight companies of state militia, including one field battery, placed the mill district of this city under martial law, after a day of rioting, due to the strike of 15,000 operatives in the cotton and woolen mills. At least 15,000 other hands were thrown out of work by the stopping of machinery and the attacks on the mills by the strikers.

Although the strike was instituted originally in protest against a reduction in pay, because of operation of the new 54-hour law, making the working day two hours shorter, the strikers now assert they will not return without a 15 per cent increase and other concessions, including double pay for overtime and the abolition of the premium or bonus system.

At a special session of court 27 rioters were found guilty. Three were sentenced to two years in the House of Correction and the other 24 were given one-year sentences.

The strikers voted to stand by the demands of an increase of 15 per cent and other concessions.

Mayor Scanlon has ordered all saloons to remain closed.

Plan to Merge Selling Agencies.

Portland.—Apple-growers who are keeping in touch with the movement to form a great selling agency for the fruit of the Northwest believe the plan is feasible and that it will be of incalculable benefit to the industry. The programme, as it stands now, is to merge the selling departments of the Hood River, Rogue River, Yakima and Wenatchee unions into one central agency.

COMPANIES ARE SURPRISED

Telegraph Chiefs Comment on Hitchcock's Proposal.

New York.—The announcement from Washington that Postmaster General Hitchcock is about to recommend general ownership of telegraph and telephone lines was received with surprise by officials of the big telegraph and telephone companies here.

"It is a bolt out of a clear sky," declared Theodore N. Vall, president of the American Telegraph & Telephone company and of the Western Union company. "Whether the government could run telegraphs economically is very doubtful," continued Vall. "The experience of Great Britain is not favorable." Edward J. Nally, vice-president and general manager of the Postal Telegraph-Cable company, did not believe congress would favor Hitchcock's idea.

Lady Birds Will Save Melons.

San Francisco.—Four tons of ladybirds, called in common parlance ladybugs, 60,000,000 in all, sufficient to keep the destructive melon aphids from 200,000 acres of melons, and also used to protect the apple and prune trees and seed gardens of the state, will be harvested in three weeks from the snows of the Sierras by E. K. Carney, superintendent of the state in ectary, with four helpers.

LARGE FORCE TO ASSEMBLE

Klamath Will Be Fied for Great Army Maneuvers.

San Francisco.—The largest army ever concentrated by this government in time of peace will be assembled on the Pacific coast during the summer months. According to dispatches to this city from Washington, it is planned by the war department to order more than 27,000 soldiers into the field in full fighting equipment. This will include all the regular and militia regiments of the six Pacific coast states—Oregon, Washington, California, Arizona, New Mexico and Utah. Cavalry, infantry, artillery, signal corps and hospital corps will be the different branches of the service which will participate. The grounds selected for the mimic battles will be in and around Klamath Falls, Or.

Roosevelt Can Withdraw.

Lincoln, Neb.—Colonel Theodore Roosevelt and Colonel W. J. Bryan will not be compelled to stand as presidential candidates on the Nebraska primary ballot if they insist on withdrawing. This is the modified ruling made by Secretary of State Walte, who heretofore has contended that a name must remain on the ballot unless the 25 men who filed the petition withdraw it.

Eastern Brewers Will Raise Hops.

Salem, Or.—Large Eastern brewers, feeling the necessity of securing a foothold in Pacific coast hopyards, have pooled interests to gain control of heavy acreage in Oregon and California for their own benefit. It is planned by the brewers to plant 1500 acres of hops this year.

A Hero in a Lighthouse

For years J. S. Donahue, So. Haven, Michigan, a civil war captain, as a lighthouse keeper, averted awful wrecks, but a queer fact is, he might have been a wreck himself, if Electric Bitters had not prevented.

"They cured me of kidney trouble and chills," he writes, "after I had taken other so called cures for years without benefit, and they also improved my sight. Now, at seventy, I am feeling fine." For dyspepsia, indigestion, all stomach, liver and kidney troubles, try Electric Bitters without equal. Try them. Only 30 cents, at Huntley Bros.

A REALISTIC PROPOSAL

By EDWARD L. SICKLES

Copyright by American Press Association, 1911.

It was a day in November, the gloom without rendering the room, lighted by a fire blazing on the hearth, cheerful by contrast. I had been asked by Daisy to take a cup of tea with her at 5 o'clock. She served the tea in thin Dresden cups, her pink fingers vying with the china in delicacy. She also gave me a very thin slice of buttered bread on a little plate. Then she handed me a napkin. With the bread plate in one hand and the teacup in the other, how was I to spread the napkin on my knees? I tried to hold the dishes in one hand that I might open the napkin with the other and spilled most of the tea into the saucer. It's just like a woman to hand a man several things at once. I didn't want either the bread or butter or the tea. Besides, I expected every minute to break one of a fifty dollar tea set.

This part of it was over at last. A maid came in and removed the agony, and we settled down to a tete-a-tete. Daisy was young, barely eighteen. I was twenty-nine. I should have talked about some subject with a bit of meat in it, but Daisy had just emerged from childhood and was making the transit into young ladyhood. So I must follow her lead under penalty of being considered old as Methuselah. She hadn't entertained many grown men, and her dashes at the job were spasmodic. In my case she brought out a book with a lot of silly printed questions, to which persons were supposed to write stupid answers.

Not that I minded this youthful nonsense. I was getting on to that age where I wouldn't have minded going back a few pegs. Daisy opened the book, handed me a pencil with a point on it any one would know had been shaped by a woman—that is, blunt as a nail head—and asked me to write an answer to the first question, "What is your favorite color?" I looked at Daisy's lips and was about to write "vermillion" when our eyes met and I put in "blue" instead.

"How singular!" she exclaimed mildly. "That's my favorite color too."

My eyes are as black as a stack of black cats.

The next question was, "Are you fond of poetry?" to which I wrote, "I love it dearly." This was keeping in line very well, and Daisy was much impressed with my taste and the delicacy with which I expressed it, but when I came to reply to the question, "What poem do you most admire?" I blundered. I couldn't remember any poem except "Little Breeches," and it would never do to put that in. Finally "Paradise Lost" occurred to me, and I wrote it in the book.

"What kind of a paradise?" Daisy asked, cocking her head on one side and looking at me like a canary bird.

"A lovely girl."

"Is that really the paradise meant in the poem?"

Evidently John Milton's great work was not familiar to her.

"I couldn't answer for that," I replied. "It's the paradise I mean."

She looked down on the book for the next question. "What trait would you most value in one you loved?" I wrote, ignoring the true meaning, "I should like her to be a blond."

"I didn't think you preferred blonds," said Daisy consciously. "I thought you preferred brunettes."

"Why should you think that?"

"Oh, I have noticed your attentions to a brunette."

A wave of self condemnation swept over me at stooping to this "veiled" dialogue, but I can't say that I was bored. The next question was, "What is your favorite proverb?" To which I wrote in answer, "Faint heart never won fair lady."

There couldn't have been a proverb more inappropriate. Daisy was so unsophisticated, so tender, that she might easily be won by a circus man or a supernumerary in a theater. I groaned when I thought what I was sinking to.

But I proceeded.

"What age would you prefer the woman you would marry to be?" was the next question, and, knowing that Daisy's next birthday would come in a month, I wrote "seventeen and eleven months."

By this time Daisy's color had heightened a bit and her shapely bosom was rising and falling a trifle more rapidly than usual. I turned the leaves to the part where were the questions for women and, pointing to a column beginning with the question, "What is your favorite flower?" asked her to do a little answering herself. But in handing her the book my hand touched hers.

That was the beginning of the second part. She took the pencil and tremblingly wrote an answer to the question.

"Yes."

"You have made me very happy," I said before I had noticed that she had by mistake placed her reply in the space allotted to "Does music affect you sentimentally?" But I was glad she and I had blundered. I quietly drew her to me and kissed her lips.

That was thirty years ago. Our oldest son is nearly as old as I was then. I wonder if when he asks a woman to be his wife—the most important negotiation in life—he will go about it in the fool way I did. Why cannot young persons do this thing with some approach to dignity?

Because it is the only part of marriage that civilization has left to a natural law.

DEADLY OIL TANKS

Ships That Are a Constant Menace to All on Board.

DEATH LURKS IN THE CARGO.

Besides the Constant Danger of the Oil Heating and Exploding and Instantly Destroying the Vessel There is Also the Peril of "Fuming."

The most dangerous sort of vessel about is that particular kind of vessel known as the oil tank, and there isn't a sailor man who will sign on for a voyage in one if he can get a job on board any other class of vessel.

The oil tank is a vessel whose cargo consists of oil, which is carried in great tanks. Two dangers are ever present to all on board—namely, that the oil may heat and explode, which means the instant destruction of the ship, or that it may burst from the tanks, in which case the ship is almost certain to be destroyed by fire.

There is also the remote danger of the oil "fuming." When the oil "fumes" the working of the ship becomes almost impossible. On a "fuming" oil tank no one can remain below deck for more than ten minutes without becoming overcome by the oil fumes, which are a hundred times more deadly to human life than coal gas.

The most terrible tragedies of the ocean have occurred on board these death traps.

A few years ago a Russian oil tank, the Omar, which sailed from Harbin bound for Bombay with 40,000 gallons of oil on board, was sighted in the Pacific by a German tramp steamer named the Velter Fend. The Omar was flying signals of distress and when sighted was apparently completely disabled, for she was making no head way.

The sea was quite calm, and the captain of the Velter Fend approached within hailing distance of the disabled ship, but no reply came from her in response to his hail.

Then the captain of the German tramp sent a boat to the silent ship. When the boat's crew reached her decks they saw five men lying on the deck, three of whom were dead. The other two were in a state of collapse, but alive.

The mate of the German tramp, who was in charge of the boat, at once guessed that the oil had "fumed" on board the oil tank, probably at night, and that the two men in a state of collapse were probably the only survivors of the disaster. This subsequently turned out to be the case.

Below the decks, where the crew of the German tramp penetrated with great difficulty and danger to their selves, for the oil was still fuming, six of the oil tank's crew were found dead in their bunks, where they had been suffocated by the fumes in their sleep. Three of the crew had succeeded in reaching the deck, but had died subsequently.

The two survivors were the only two on deck when the fumes burst from the tanks and in their efforts to save themselves had very nearly perished themselves.

The crew of a Norwegian oil tank named the Helios had a terrible experience a few years ago in mid-Atlantic. During a heavy gale, in which the Helios suffered very rough handling in the mountainous seas, her oil tanks, containing 90,000 gallons of crude oil, burst and flowed into the bunkers, threatening to penetrate in a few minutes into the foreroom.

The crew flung themselves at the pumps like madmen. The oil soon began to fume, and no man could keep at the pumps for more than a few minutes without becoming overpowered. The captain of the Helios ordered all the crew on deck, and four in their turn went below every five minutes to work at the pumps.

The fight they made for their lives was one of the most desperate that has ever been waged on the ocean. Directly the tank had burst the firemen had been ordered out of the foreroom. There was no time to quench the fire, for the firemen would certainly have been suffocated by the fumes of the oil and they remained below to do so.

For eleven hours the officers and crew of the Helios worked like demons at the pumps, making the most desperate efforts to keep the oil from reaching the fore room. By the end of that time eight of the crew lay motionless on the deck, overcome partly by exhaustion and partly by the fumes.

It was now only possible to work two of the pumps, and it became certain that, unless help arrived in another hour, the ship, with every living soul on board, would perish. It should be mentioned that every lifeboat on the Helios had been damaged during the storm.

Half an hour passed, and by then only the captain and the mate were working at the pumps. The destruction of the vessel was now only a matter of minutes. It was at this critical juncture that the oil tank was sighted by the Majesty of the White Star line, and twenty minutes later the crew of the doomed ship were safely on board the liner.

As the last man scrambled on board the Majesty from the boat which had been sent to the help of the Helios a mountain of flame sprang from the decks of the oil tank, and a few minutes later the blazing vessel sank below the water.

A Russian oil tank named the Vladimir some years ago exploded in mid-ocean, when every one of her crew perished. This disaster took place in the southern Pacific—London Answers.

A Nervous Shock.

When Mr. Lawton returned from a long conference with his son in the barn Mrs. Lawton was in a fever of impatience. "Well, did you find out what's the matter with him, Henry?" she asked eagerly.

"He's feeling kind of low spirited," said Mr. Lawton. "He's made a bad investment of some money."

"Speculating?" groaned the mother. "There! I knew we never ought to have let him go to the city alone to work, no matter if 'twas a good offer. What's he been gambling in?"

"Well, 'twasn't gambling exactly," said Mr. Lawton mildly. "He met a young lady that lived ten miles out, and he liked her so well that he bought himself a fifty ride ticket to her place, and the fourth time he went she told him that she was engaged to another young man."

"He's my own boy, and he isn't one to let his affections spoil his life, so he told me that when he found out she was going to marry a man right in her own town and that he had business that took him into the city now and again he sealed the ticket right up in an envelope and laid it away to give me for a wedding present."

"If it of course he's had some regrets, in
