CUTTING
RED TAPE

By F. A. MITCHEL

Joaquin Nunez and Pepita Alvarez lived in a little town not more than a mile from the Texas border. Along that border were strung United States troops to protect the Americans from incursions of the Mexicans.

The bandit generals were as merciless toward their own men as to the citizens. When a deserter was caught his captors did not take the trouble to convene a court martial to try him. They stood him up and shot him.

It was among such rank growth that the delicate flower of love sprang up between young Nunez and Pepita Alvarez. Nunez was not a mean spirited, cowardly citizen. Quite likely he had not been honest he would have been a bandit, for he feared no man and, like most Mexicans, when he was injured did not trouble the courts as plaintiff against his injurer, but settled the matter out of court, taking pains to get the drop on the defendant. Nevertheless Nunez was not a bully and was never known to fight without good cause.

One day a bandit troop invaded the territory where the lovers lived. The robbers took everything they could get their hands on without payment, and no effort was made to stop them except by concealing the stores.

But there was one thing taken which could not be bought with money and to the taking of which resistance was made. A bandit saw little Pepita with her pretty red cheeks and her dark eyes fringed with long lashes, fell in love with her and determined to possess her.

Nunez had gone away for some purpose and when he returned was told that while Pepita was walking in the outskirts of the town a man from the bandit force was seen to swoop down upon her and carry her off. Her shrieks were heard by the whole town, but so great was the terror of the bandits that not a finger was raised to save her.

Nunez returned but a short time after the abduction. Without dismounting he hurried off after the bandit and soon came within hearing distance of Pepita's cries. The bandit did not stop within the camp, but kept on toward a forest not far distant. Nunez sent a shot after him, but he was not within range. The bandit dropped Pepita and, instead of turning and facing his pursuer, changed his course to the Texas line.

Nunez took up Pepita, who revived speedily from the shock she had received, placed her on his horse and took her home. Then he went to the bandit chief and asked that the ransom which had crossed the border be demanded of the American troops that he might be punished for his attempted crime. The chief, who restricted his men to taking necessities, at once went to the border and, raising a white flag, crossed to the headquarters of the colonel commanding the United States troops. There he found the colonel in campaign uniform—namely, woolen shirt, trousers and boots—and made a formal demand for the culprit.

Now, there was much red tape among the troops, which was unknown on the other side of the line. The colonel was responsible to the general, the general to the secretary of war, and the secretary of war to a man who had crossed the border to Mexican authority was attended with much difficulty. The colonel told the chief that he must refer the matter to the general, who was some 200 miles distant. If the general directed that the fugitive be surrendered the colonel would cheerfully obey the order.

While the negotiations were going on a group of United States troops was standing a few hundred feet north of the border line and a group of Mexicans a few feet south of the line. Among the Americans was the man who had carried off Pepita. He had taken refuge among them, as in medieval times one sought for his life took refuge in a sanctuary, though the soldiers were by no means sacred persons. The chief of the bandits was in the colonel's tent making his application for the culprit.

The interview being unduly prolonged, the Mexicans, who were agitated at the abduction, became impatient. Among them was the lover, chafing at the delay.

When the colonel informed the bandit chief that he must refer the matter between them to the general the chief asked what would be done supposing the general refused to give up the culprit. The colonel said that in that case nothing could be done. The chief turned toward the group of Mexicans standing south of the border line, took off his great conical hat and waved it.

A puff of blue smoke was seen, and a shot was heard. The chief, turning to the colonel, said:

"My request is withdrawn. You may keep the man."

He whose fate had been bound up in so much red tape was a dead body. He had been shot by Nunez from across the border line.

The proceedings having been thus ended the Mexicans dispersed, Nunez being escorted back to the town by his fellow citizens. No one having claimed the body of the culprit, he was buried by the United States troops. The colonel had been saved a lot of correspondence, which greatly relieved him, for it was almost impossible to get the Mexicans—the only means of communication—to carry any message, no matter how important.

The same evening Joaquin Nunez and Pepita Alvarez were married with great eclat.

PREVENT POTATO SCAB.

Treatment For Tubers Intended to Be Used For Seed.

The per cent of scabby tubers in this season's crop will be reduced if seed potatoes are treated with formalin or corrosive sublimate before being cut to plant, says Professor E. L. Kilpatrick in the Orange Judd Farmer. The formalin treatment consists of soaking the tubers for two hours in a solution of formaldehyde and water at the rate of one pint to each thirty gallons of water. The other treatment uses two ounces of corrosive sublimate to each fifteen gallons of water. Corrosive sublimate is very poisonous and should be used with care. Tubers are given the same time in this liquid as in the formalin.

Either treatment may be given by placing the tubers in an old gunny sack and lowering them into a barrel or tub containing the liquid. Tubers may be spread out on the grass or barn floor to dry, after which they are ready to cut and plant. Any number of sacks of potatoes may be treated in either solution. Since formalin evaporates very rapidly, the vessel containing it is kept covered to preserve the strength of the liquid.

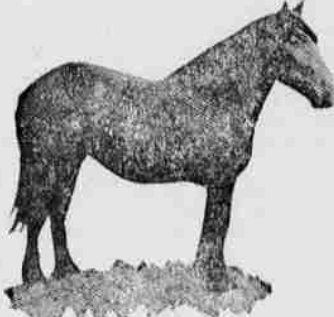

TREATMENT FOR CAULK
WOUNDS IN HORSES

When horses are sharp shod and the snow is deep conditions are just right for caulk wounds at the crown of the hoof. Remove caulks or shoes, if sharp, before starting a team out in deep snow, says Dr. M. H. Reynolds, University farm, St. Paul, Minn.

A caulk wound should be thoroughly cleaned at once. Contaminations should then be prevented. Nothing additional in the way of washing or other treatment that is not actually necessary should be done, adds Dr. Reynolds.

Cleanliness at the very beginning of treatment may be secured either by long continued irrigation or infections with a mild antiseptic, such as common salt—a teaspoonful to a quart of water. Military surgeons have found during the present war that a tablespoonful of chlorinated lime to a quart of warm water applied thoroughly twice a day to every part of the wound, is very satisfactory for this preliminary cleansing. Either one should be applied continuously to every part of the wound for at least an hour before the wound is considered thoroughly and safely clean.

Strong disinfectants may also be used. These give quicker results and are in some cases more practical. Hydrochloric acid or even nitrohydrochloric acid may be used for the first treatment provided it is applied to every part of the torn surface in the depth of the wound and provided the skin is not burned with it. Undiluted carbolic acid or the tincture of iodine in full strength may also be used. Two or three thorough treatments with the iodine should be given the first day. Plugs of cotton may be soaked in the tincture of iodine and packed in the wound.

After this first thorough treatment use a drying antiseptic powder composed of iodoform, tannic acid and boric acid, equal parts by bulk, applying lightly three times a day. But it is of the utmost importance to keep such a wound out of mud and filth.

A stockman attempting to treat a wound of this kind will usually do better to avoid bandaging.

Worms In Swine.

For stomach worms in swine a good remedy is one to two teaspoonfuls of turpentine (vary according to size) well mixed with two to four ounces of castor or olive oil, repeated for three days, and in two weeks repeat the entire treatment. For kidney worms the following medicated salt works well: Four parts of charcoal and three parts each of salt, sulphur, Glauber's salt and sal soda. These should be well mixed and placed where they can get at will. Where hogs are infested with any parasite seriously it is not advisable to allow them to run in the same lots year after year; in fact, the run should be changed each year. Another source of infection is the drinking water. That should not be allowed to drink stagnant water nor water that is polluted by surface drainage, especially from the yards and runways.

Stocked Legs.

Stocked legs affect horses that stand idle in the stable. A yard should be kept into which to turn all horses for exercise when they get no work. A colt that cannot be exercised should also have a box stall, and if his legs stock they must be bandaged from hoof to hock each time he comes in.

NOT SURE OF BONDS

L. Funk Thinks Program Too Extensive for Funds Available

Redland, April 1, 1917.

Editor Courier: Having read several articles as to how the $6,000,000 bond issue would help the farmers, I wish to make a few statements that have not been touched upon. One thing is sure; no one will escape taxation on the bonds, if passed, as everyone will contribute some towards that fund. The one-fourth mill will give the commission about $220,000 under the present assessed valuation, but if the recommendation of the state tax commission to county assessors is followed the one-fourth mill may easily bring in, in a few years, $500,000 "and of course the university and college have an interest in the raise, also. And at the rate of increase of autos in the state, about 8000 a year at an average of $3 per license, at least $300,000 can be raised, so there will be no dispute about these resources not taking care of the bonds and interest if passed. Provided some future legislature does not change the program. But if any one thinks that the bond issue is going to complete the hard surface roads as laid out, about 800 miles, they have another guess coming.

Multnomah county recently bonded for $3,300,000 and built out of that sum about 70 miles of road, including about 30 miles of Columbia highway, about one-half of the proposed bond issue, to show that this is only a starter toward a general bonding system for the state.

I would refer you to an address of R. V. Holman of Multnomah county in the Oregon Journal of March 3, 1917, to show that no estimate ever covered all work undertaken. For instance the Vista house was to have cost $12,000, while up to date $50,000 has been spent. Another instance, when this county's bond issue was before the people they promised they would improve the lateral or feeder roads into the city, but these promises have been forgotten except by Mr. Holman, when he opposed the hard surfacing of 10 miles of the Linnton-St. Helens road at an estimated cost of $259,000, a road as good or better than any that Clackamas county has. But this is a link in the hard surface road to Astoria and of course the power at the throne put it through. Now we might use some sense in this bond issue of the state if they did not make these hard surface roads for pleasure trips. As shown by the maps, all roads to be hard surfaced parallel either railroad, electric lines or steam boats, and in most cases both. Even a loop up the west side of the Willamette to Independence and also the east side of the Willamette; where does this help the farmer?

Of course we realize the counties that have already bonded the limit for good roads will no doubt get the first pull, which of course was the program outlined some years ago by the ring that is trying to put this through.

Now, Mr. Editor, if you think that the farmers are a unit for this bond issue you had better think again. There is only one thing to be gained by this bond issue and others to follow, that when these pleasure roads are completed us farmers that have stuff to haul to market or transportation points may sooner get a pull at the county funds, as that fund would not be needed to keep up the trunk line.

And now, in conclusion, Mr. Editor, I have talked quite a bit with my neighbors and find that we all want good roads and are going it heavy by making 10-mill levies for road district taxes, beside the seven-mill county levy for roads, but I believe if the matter was put before the people to bond the road district for hard surface to build roads to market under road district supervision the matter would carry big.

Yours for better roads to market. Yes, I have a "Ford" and am willing that the tax should go on the roads, and when that loop is completed will make the trip, providence permitting.

90 MILES OF SPUDS

Clackamas Has Greater Potato Acreage Than Other Counties

Oregon's potato patch is ten miles long and nine miles wide. Now, strictly speaking, Oregon has no such individual patch; but her potato-producing area, scattered in little sections all over the state, as indicated in a survey just completed by Prof. A. C. Hopkins of the school of commerce for the U. S. department of agriculture, is approximately 55,000 acres.

On this area was produced in 1916 an average of 1550 bushels an acre, or 21 bushels above the ten-year average. Of this total, 35,791 tons, or 2,386 carloads were exported, the greater part to California and Texas and the southwest for seed purposes.

California is the greatest market for Oregon seed potatoes. The best known seed varieties are the Early White Rose, Burbank, American Wonder, Gold Coin, Prize-taker and Red Rose.

The value of Oregon's potato exports last year amounted to more than $1,400,000, as indicated by the returns in the hands of Mr. Hopkins, and the indications for a constantly widening market are reported as most favorable. Big California buyers are ready, according to information given Mr. Hopkins, to take all the good seed grown in this state. This, with the continuing demand for other states as far east as the Mississippi valley, will take care of the product of an increased acreage next year.

Prices for the ten-year period have ranged from 75 cents to $3.50 a hundred pounds, the higher figure reached within the last few months. Cost of production has seldom risen higher than 70 cents a hundred.

Clackamas is the largest potato producer among the counties of Oregon, with Marion second, then Washington, Multnomah, Lane, Linn, Union, Coos, Yamhill and Umatilla in the order named.

Oregon's largest tract of potatoes, so far as reported to Mr. Hopkins, is E. E. Morrison's 60 acres near Springfield, in Lane county. Mr. Morrison hopes to experiment with irrigation in his potato acreage this season, expecting to increase the yield by perhaps as much as 50 per cent.

PATRIOTISM SHOWN

Girl's Honor Guard Stirs Loyal Hearts by Preparedness Meeting

With every feature designed to lend color to the spirit of patriotism that inspired the event, the rally of the Girls' Honor guard Friday night was a success from the time the parade started through Main street until the stirring patriotic program at Busch's hall had been completed.

Miss Cis Pratt presided at the meeting at Busch's hall, and introduced those who aided in the program. The hall was crowded beyond capacity and the cheering that was indulged in was heard for blocks. Reed Moore, of the local G. A. R. post, was the first speaker, and recalled interestingly the days of the Civil war. The G. A. R. rifle and drum corps rendered patriotic numbers and the guard sang "Rally 'Round the Flag." Mayor E. C. Hackett spoke briefly in praise of the Honor guard movement, and was followed by the appearance of the high school girls' quartet. The quartet sang "Don't Bite the Hand That's Feeding You."

The feature addresses of the evening were those by James H. Cary of Oregon City and Captain Cicero F. Hogan of Portland. Mr. Cary's talk aroused the large audience to the seriousness of the present national crisis. Captain Hogan talked forcefully against that class of youth standing back to let others volunteer to the defense of the flag. Their attitude is that of "let George do it," Captain Hogan said, and it is an attitude of which Oregon may well be ashamed. He made a plea for volunteers. Lieutenant George Jett of the Oregon naval militia, was another speaker. He called attention to the part the

FIRE AT SANDY

Blaze Explodes Cartridges. Women Aid in Fighting Flames

The store of the Sandy Mercantile company and the Glauckner hardware store at Sandy were burned at midnight Saturday night, and the bank and postoffice were damaged by the flames, the total loss entailed being nearly $8000, with partial insurance on the fire.

The fire started from an over-heated stove in the G. A. Glauckner hardware store and spread to the adjoining buildings. A bucket brigade was formed and the flames fought by the citizens, the place having no organized fire company. Cartridges exploded in the hardware store and for a time were a source of danger.

During the fire the telephone office in the burning building was moved out into the street and volunteers saved much goods from the store. Among the women fire fighters who did valiant work were Mrs. P. T. Shelley, Miss Kate Junker, Miss Mary Junker, Mrs. Laandree, Mrs. A. L. Deaton, Mrs. M. A. Deaton, Mrs. R. E. Esson, Miss Frances Meinig, Miss Gertrude Meinig, Miss Ruth Revenue, Mrs. R. E. Bonnett, Mrs. George Wolfe, Mrs. Jack Sealls.

OLSON ACQUITTED

District Attorney Threatens Prosecution of Witnesses

August Olson, indicted secretly by the recent grand jury, was found not guilty of the unlawful sale of intoxicants by a jury in Judge Campbell's court last Thursday. Olson was charged with selling liquor to one Orin Adkins and was accused of running a general bootlegging business at his Mulino garage. It is understood that Adkins, who had sworn to a statement that he bought liquor from Olson, turned against the state and in view of his evidence no other verdict could be found.

Friday night Deputy District Attorney Thomas A. Burke said that certain phases of the evidence offered at the trial yesterday will be placed before the next grand jury for investigation.
