PORTLAND, OREGON

EARLY DAYS OF CITY RECALLED BY PIONEER DURING VISIT HERE

Brigadier General Medorem Crawford, who has been at the home of his sister, Mrs. H. C. Stevens, left Saturday on his return trip to his home at Washington, D. C.

Brigadier General Crawford is a native of Oregon, and says he is proud of it. He was born in Yamhill county, near the home of his father and mother, the late Medorem and Adeline Crawford, who crossed the plains by ox team in 1842, and were among the first pioneers to make the long journey to the coast from the Middle States.

The Brigadier General has the distinction of being the first white child born west of the Willamette river in the Willamette valley. The family came to Oregon City in 1845 from Wheatland, coming down the Willamette river in canoes. At Rock Island camp was pitched for the night, for the rain was coming down in torrents and the wind blowing a gale, a night the family long remembered. After arriving on the island, the canoes were taken from the water, turned upside down, and the boats gave them shelter for the night. The following morning the weather moderated and the journey continued until Oregon City was reached. Arriving here the family took up their abode in a log cabin that had been erected by the early pioneers and was built near the stream that flows down the bluff at the rear of the Weinhard building. The creek at that time was a rushing torrent. Large fir trees were growing where now stands the Weinhard, and also where the court house and other buildings are at present. There was no Main Street, and but a roadway existed, made by the immigrants coming into the city to look for a home. There were no houses on the hill, and there was nothing to greet the eye but a forest, with Indian teepees scattered here and there, and the Crawford family soon made friends, the children soon being able to speak the jargon language fluently.

Medorem Crawford, father of the now Brigadier General, purchased two large black oxen and a large wagon, and had a monopoly on hauling supplies. He did a good business, and he would meet the bateaux (large open boats) at Canemah, and haul the provisions down to the city of about three stores, these being located near where the Hawley mill stands, and where the first newspaper office was established. Cattle were owned by Governor Abernethy, and the other was that of the Hudson Bay Company. A grist mill owned by Dr. John McLoughlin was visited by the Crawford family, where the boys were greatly interested in the workings, but the boys were somewhat shy when the proprietor, Dr. McLoughlin, appeared. This was because the old pioneer wore his hair long, and this was an unusual sight for the lads. He made friends with the youngsters, however, and they learned to love the old miller.

While in this city the Brigadier General looked in vain for familiar sites, but owing to many changes was unable to identify any of them.

The Crawford boys attended a little school where now stands the home of Judge Grant B. Dimick. This building was also used for a church, the building being a one-story structure with several windows at the side, thus allowing very good light. The first teacher of the school was Rev. Fisher, whom Brigadier General Crawford says "believed in licking."

The next teacher was Rev. Chandler, who believed differently from Rev. Fisher in punishing the children by whipping. Instead he would make the children stand in the center of the room holding a heavy book with his hand upright. This was more severe than whipping, and he was more successful in maintaining order in school room than the minister who believed in "licking." These men were Baptist missionaries.

In 1852 the Crawford family moved to Yamhill county, settling on what is now known as the Crawford D. L. C. The father engaged in farming, and the boys were allowed to attend the schools and also gain some knowledge of farming as a sideline.

Medorem Crawford, the son, was sent to West Point, where he received military training, and after four years' school, entered the army as a lieutenant, being promoted rapidly until he received the title of brigadier general. For some time he was stationed at Vancouver Barracks in the early days, and later was sent to Alaska. He served continuously in the army until 1908, when he retired, owing to his age.

Brigadier General Crawford's son, Lawrence, is a colonel, stationed in Maine, and is now a member of the War Federal Board for Reconstruction of Soldiers, the only military officer in the army all his life.

Captain Medorem Crawford, Jr., who was in command of the United States forces in charge of some of the German towns, recently returned to the United States with the First Division, with General Pershing. He is now professor of military science at Durham, N. C. Captain Crawford was born at Fort Monroe, Virginia, and has been with the board. He has been in the service in France.

With these two sons serving their country in the army, two daughters of Brigadier General and Mrs. Crawford have done their war work with the Red Cross.

Washington, D. C., being the native city of Mrs. Crawford, the family decided to make that city their future home.

Among the old friends still remaining here Brigadier General Crawford located Robert Canfield, who was a student of the Little Baptist school at the time the Crawford boys attended, and the two pioneers had a reunion a few days ago, and many reminiscences were exchanged.

The retiring officer says he is returning to visit his old home town again in the near future, for he still has a longing for the old western home state.

ROAD ROUTING CONTROVERSY BE ABRITRATED

Three men will determine which road is to be improved under the proposed $1,700,000 bond issue, the one originally selected being from Damascus to the Multnomah county line and later changed to run from Boring to the boundary of Multnomah county. J. C. Elliott, representing Damascus, and Wallace Telford, representing Boring, appeared before a sub-committee on Tuesday evening and argued the matter, which was finally referred to a board of arbitration, following modern methods of settling disputes. Mr. Telford and Mr. Elliott will each select a representative, and they will name a third, and the committee will be governed by the decision of the board. Less than three miles of road is involved, but a controversy of no small proportions has been stirred up. The board is expected to make known its decision by Saturday of this week, and then the road petitions calling for a special election will be placed in circulation without further delay.

L. L. Porter, J. J. Tobin and J. C. Williams went to Portland Tuesday and appeared before the state highway commission in behalf of the county and the cities of Oregon City and West Linn in an effort to obtain a definite understanding with the commission which had already agreed to pay $100,000 of the cost of a new bridge across the Willamette river. Several Portland organizations, however, have urged the highway commission to be more liberal in its attitude toward the proposed structure, on the ground that the bridge will not be simply a local affair, but an important link in the Pacific Highway and carrying through traffic. The county court Tuesday committed the Clackamas county to the payment of $119,000, in the event the bonds are voted, as $105,000 is set apart for the bridge in the bonding act, to which should be added a sinking fund of $14,000 already accumulated.

A large delegation of citizens of the Sandy district went to Portland Tuesday to ask the highway commission to designate the Sandy bluff road as the route for the loop highway around Mount Hood, but the commission indicated it was not ready to select the route. C. D. Purcell, of Sandy, made a strong presentation of the claims of the Sandy bluff route.

PIONEER RESIDENT OF OREGON CITY DEAD AT ASTORIA.

ASTORIA, Oct. 7.—Mrs. Matilda Jane Wood, widow of Captain Z. C. Wood, for many years a captain on the Columbia river, died last night. Captain and Mrs. Wood settled in Oregon City in 1874 and shortly after came to the coast, dividing their time between this city and Seaside, where Captain Wood died about six years ago. Two sons, six grandchildren and three great grandchildren, residing at Sumter, Portland and Seaside, survive, as do two sisters, one Mrs. S. S. Walker, of Oregon City. A brother also survives. The funeral will be held Monday afternoon.

The great majority of the national flags are telecolours, but a few like Japan and Switzerland, are content with two colors.
