Get Behind the Goat

Were it possible to furnish housing facilities for the workmen and a manufacturing concern offering to turn out a useful product and distribute a payroll of $600,000 yearly were to consider locating in Oregon City, the Live Wires and every public spirited citizen, would leave no stone unturned to secure its location here.

A. C. Gage, editor of the Angora Journal, an enthusiastic advocate for the goat industry, but having a reputation for conservatism, states that within the territory of which Oregon City is the natural trading center 150,000 goats can be bred annually. That these goats will bring in a cash revenue of four dollars each is lower than will be the actual result. They will be brought to maturity on brush and waste land, cleaning and preparing it for clover pasture or the plow. Practically the entire output will be ready for market without extra help upon the farms. Stop for a moment and consider what this added revenue would mean for Clackamas county farmers and merchants, and then instead of making the goat the butt for jokes, get behind the goat and let him butt his way into fields that are not now productive and will with the high price of labor be unproductive for years to come unless turned over to his goatship.

A tilt at cards with music followed.
