MONEY IS POWER. It not merely brings the comforts and pleasures of life, but it is influence, and patronage. It builds up, and it tears down, according as its support is given or withheld.

It is the short sighted person who considers only the immediate results of his purchase on himself. He should consider also whether the after effects of his purchase are going to help him, or going to hurt him.

When a man buys an article in a home store, he gets two results. One is immediate and very tangible. He gets the satisfaction of the food he buys, and the comfort of the clothing he purchases. But is that all?

The purchase being made at home, a direct stimulus is given to his home interests. He is thereby helped make a business friendship with the man of whom he bought the goods. If such purchases are continued, a dealer looks at him as a friend worth cultivating, will take special pains to meet his needs, and guarantee him satisfaction.

The home dealer is made more prosperous by the home purchase. He can in turn help out some other home dealer. The dollar circulating at home increases home business, means more taxable property, more money in one's own town available for all public causes, more funds to employ labor here, general prosperity, and advance in the value of all property.

On the contrary, the dollar spent in some other town never comes back. It goes to build up some other and rival town, or often some great far away city. There are no after effects favorable to the buyer.

It would seem as if a spirit of self-interest, if not of local patriotism, and community spirit, should lead any intelligent person to spend money in such a way as to receive the additional benefit that comes from keeping money at home.

NEWSPAPER READERS must have been impressed with the idea that the last few weeks have seen an unusual amount of crime.

Holdups, burglaries, highway robbery, have been common. This is probably due in part to unemployment. But social economists have been feeling for some time that crime is increasing. It seems as if society were making a poor job of its remedial measures.

A judge remarked in a recent magazine article that one type of criminals consists of fellows of exceptional daring. They began by robbing an orchard, go on to breaking of game laws, petty graft, etc., and finally attempt some bold break.

Put such fellows down in Mexico to protect some property against the firebrand greasers, and they would be a tower of strength to law and order. In a few years, the edge of their fever would be dulled. They would be ready to come back and put on the harness of ordinary work. It is a mistake to hold an energetic boy down too close.

The other and more numerous class of criminals seem merely to be weak willed. They see an opportunity to snatch a purse and simply can't resist. Jail to them is a fitting school of crime. They come out with better knowledge of the technique of the craft. The judge referred to above said that such men are originally no more in love with criminal life than a drunkard is in love with the attack of delirium which he sees coming on him.

If men of this type had only been taught some useful and fairly lucrative trade, they would rarely have to be boarded at public expense. When work stops, crime increases. The problem of unemployment must be solved before the growth of crime can be stopped.

THE FIGHT OF ALLEN EATON for speakership of the Oregon house of representatives is more than the usual political tangle. There is something more than a contest between Mr. Eaton and Mr. Selling, both capable men. It is a fight between Portland and the rest of the state.

It is acknowledged that Portland is the largest city in the state and that it should have its rightful proportion of influence and honor at the state capital but there is no reason why the big city should hog all the honors and power. In the last five years, Portland has won far more than its share of political victories at Salem. Portland men have been speaker of the house and president of the senate far more than legislators from all other counties in the state. Mr. Selling, himself, has held the presidency of the upper house, a greater honor than the position for which he is now a candidate. To make it short: Mr. Selling is the candidate of Portland; Mr. Eaton a candidate for the rest of the state.

In point of service, Mr. Eaton is the oldest member of the legislature. He voted for every United States senator elected under statement No. 1. It is to be doubted if there is another man in the state who has made a more complete study of legislative procedure. He is a thorough believer in clean, representative government and he has evolved a complete, practical method of procedure that will save more than 25 per cent of the customary expense of a session of the legislature, without lessening any business efficiency.

Mr. Eaton has two planks in his platform that show his stand. They are: "A reduction of at least one-fourth in the expense of running the house."

"A change in methods of organization and procedure that will produce fewer bills, fairer consideration of bills and of their authors, and more time for important legislation."

IT IS HARDLY POSSIBLE that those who favor the proposed charter amendment have gone to trouble to seriously study the situation; in fact, it is to be doubted if they have gone further than mutter "It's our money and we ought to take it."

Any action of any kind toward the adoption of such an amendment until the supreme court decides the validity of the plan, would be nothing more than foolish. If the amendment were put before the voters and adopted it would instantly plunge the city into litigation unless the supreme court had already handed down a decision.

But even if the supreme court should hold that an amendment were not in conflict with higher laws, it would not be to the best interests of Oregon City to adopt the plan. True, it would add to the revenue of the town about $9,000 a year, a sum which could be very well used in Oregon City at the present time. But the country districts need this money even more than Oregon City. If every town in the county were to receive all the road money collected within its limits the general road fund would be reduced materially, for city property is highly assessed.

The development of the town and the country goes hand in hand. When one prospers, the other is affected. Neither Oregon City, nor Molalla, nor Canby, nor any other incorporated town can well exist without aid from the rural districts. Town merchants are keen competitors for the country business for a farmer's trade means good cash business. But to shut off all road money collected within the cities would be to cripple road work in many districts of the county. It would put Clackamas county back a dozen years in road construction. Surely Oregon City does not want to be a hog.

INTEREST IS BEING EXPRESSED in the coming one hundredth anniversary of the first American savings bank, which was started 98 years ago in Philadelphia. These banks have had a marvellous growth, with deposits today totaling nearly five billions of money.

The development of savings banks is a matter of great public importance from the fact that so many people know so little about securities. If small investors lose their little capital, they conclude that they might just as well spend their money and get the good of it, as to lay it away only to see it lost by dishonesty or incompetence. This discourages thrift, reduces the supply of loanable capital, restricts the development of the country, besides causing no end of personal suffering.

Some people have the easy impression that anything bearing the title of Savings Bank is sound and secure. Unfortunately the laws and financial practice of the various states vary greatly. The banks in one state may be sound and solid, while right over the border there may be loose laws and perfunctory inspections.

The savings bank near home is apt to be the safest investment. It comes down largely to a case of the personality of the men. Any intelligent workingman can form a general impression as to the ability and efficiency of the officers in charge of a bank in his own neighborhood. A small bank near home, handled by men of prudence and common sense, is a safer risk for the small investor than some bigger institution miles away. The distant bank may have grander pillars and finer marble. But it may be in the hands of financiers who are playing the stock market, or who have large and hopeless ideas about doubtful securities.

IT HAS BEEN SEVERAL DAYS since the prohibition amendment was put to a vote in the national house of representatives and, judging from press comments and public opinion everywhere, the Hobson measure was successful even though defeated.

Even the prohibitionists were surprised at the strength of their measure. The vote was not along party lines nor divided according to the divisions of the country. Representatives from dry and wet states alike favored the bill. The strength of the measure showed that the prohibition movement is a sweeping national reform, not a narrow, unconnected spasm developed only in communities and states. The vote raises the prohibition question on a level with the currency problem and other measures of national importance.

The year 1914 has seen notable advancement in the interest of the prohibition cause. Four new states, Oregon, Washington, Colorado and Arizona, adopted a clause in their constitutions against the legal traffic in liquor and in each case the majority was large. In only one state, California, was there a large negative majority and even there the "drys" have a vision of victory at an election to held within the next year.

THE YEAR JUST CLOSING has seen many changes in Oregon City and Clackamas county. As a whole, they are changes for the better; changes that denote progress and advancement rather than decline.

The practical working out of prohibition in Oregon City is probably the most important item concerning this city. In the last year, crime has decreased, drunkenness has been reduced, and we find that our town is cleaner and better. A reduction is possible in the police force and after the first of the year the number of officers will be reduced to two.

The completion of the Willamette Valley Southern through to Mt. Angel, the consolidation of the Crown-Columbia Paper company with the Willamette Pulp & Paper company, the construction of the Carver line from Portland into Clackamas county; these and other changes, all within the year 1914, point to the commercial upbuilding of Oregon City, and the prosperity of Clackamas County. There is no need of indulging in broad sweeping statements in boosting Oregon City when there are such substantial facts as these.

In the latter half of this year, important changes in the government of the town have begun which may lead to a new charter. The appointment of a charter committee, a thorough study of municipal finances, and the drafting of a charter amendment indicate a desire for a better town government.

Momentous Happenings Not Productive of Great or Enduring Literature

By WILLIAM D. HOWELLS, Dean of American Authors

I HAVE never believed that great events produced great literature. They seldom call forth the great creative powers of man. In poetry it is not the poems of occasion that endure, but the poems that have come into being independently, not as the result of momentous happenings.

The present war does not furnish the poet, the novelist and the dramatist with the material of literature.

And the reason for this is that fighting is no longer our ideal. Fighting was not a great ideal, and therefore it is no longer our ideal. ALL THAT OLD MATERIAL OF LITERATURE—THE CLASHING OF SWORDS, THE THUNDER OF SHOT AND SHELL, THE GREAT CLOUDS OF SMOKE, THE BLOOD AND FURY—ALL THIS HAS GONE OUT FROM LITERATURE. IT IS AN ANACHRONISM.

Of course the civil war because of its peculiar nature was followed by an expansion, intellectual as well as social and economic, and this expansion undoubtedly had its beneficial effect on literature. But the civil war itself did not have, could not have, literary expression.

OF ALL THE WRITINGS WHICH THE CIVIL WAR DIRECTLY INSPIRED I CAN THINK OF ONLY ONE THAT HAS ENDURED TO BE CALLED LITERATURE. THAT IS LOWELL'S "COMMEMORATION ODE."

War stops literature. It is an upheaval of civilization, a return to barbarism. It means death to all the arts. Even the preparation for war stops literature. It stopped it in Germany many years ago.

The Panama Pacific Exposition The Exposition That Will Be Ready

Having recently returned from a trip to San Francisco in the interest of the agricultural exhibits of the Willamette Valley and the state of Oregon at the Panama Pacific Exposition, O. E. Freytag, manager of the publicity is enthusiastic over what he has seen, and has the following to tell of the Exposition, with its beauty, educational features, and its fascinating and entertaining features.

The Panama Pacific Exposition is such a vast organization that one can not without seeing it comprehend its enormous proportions. Miles of beautiful boulevards and avenues bordered with magnificent tropical palms and shrubbery of every description and gaily colored flowers, artistic summer houses and arbors and elaborate statuary make a superbly gorgeous setting for the marvellously beautiful buildings surrounded by forests of ever greens of every variety known to California.

The buildings in themselves show the handiwork of great masters in art. The buildings have been given the appearance of having been there for centuries. Great domes of the Palaces of Agriculture and Horticulture, Art and Education cover about five acres each, and are masterpieces of beauty.

The Tower of Jewels, four hundred and twenty-five feet in height is ornamented with ten tons of prisms and is a thing of sparkling beauty by day and by night, sending off the soft colors of the rainbow.

Festival Hall will be a great attraction because of the musical and other events which are planned and this building likewise is one of great beauty. There are too many buildings to enumerate, but all are graced with beautiful statuary such as has never been seen in America. This Exposition in point of beauty and artistic arrangement will surpass any former fair.

The Oregon building is a log structure, not unlike the Forestry Building at the Lewis and Clark Fair only more extensive. It will house exhibits of every nature from the State of Oregon, will contain a lecture hall with a large seating capacity, an Art Department, Agricultural, Horticultural and Forestry Exhibits. The Oregon Agricultural College will maintain a domestic science department, where demonstrations will be given, and they will feed at a minimum cost Oregonians who chance to be visitors to the Fair. A handsome reception room with a great homey fireplace will provide a resting place and a meeting point for Oregonians and their friends.

The Oregon Building will be surrounded with shrubbery and trees of Oregon evergreens and a profusion of holly trees. On the grounds fronting on the bay is a game park, and a reproduction in miniature of the Columbia river for a distance of 60 miles. The scenic Pacific Highway and the industries along the river will be shown in their proper locations and proportions.

In the Agricultural and Horticultural Palaces Oregon will have her exhibits for awards. Oregon has 1073 square feet in the Agricultural Palace in which will be placed a large comprehensive and unique exhibit for competition. One third of this space will be occupied by the eight Willamette Valley counties with the magnificent products of farm and field. This exhibit is surrounded by a column of huge logs like the Oregon building. A pergola effect will be secured with this treatment, and this exhibit will tend to show the variety of product, and the immensity and the possibilities of this famous garden spot of the world.

The Horticultural exhibit in the Horticultural Palace with a space of about 2500 square feet will show the horticultural industry of Hood River, Southern Oregon and the Willamette Valley.

One of the novel features of the Hood River Exhibit is an apple 15 feet high, the interior showing a perspective view of the Hood River Valley. Hood River has a magnificent and realistic panoramic photograph thirty-two feet long, showing Hood River orchards in blossom time in the Oregon building. Clackamas County will be wonderfully represented by magnificent grains, grasses and fruits, and the diversity of her products will be shown in the exhibit of the Valley counties in the Oregon building, Agricultural Palace and in the Horticultural exhibit. Great competition will be experienced in this section for exhibits will be seen from all parts of the world. But even though the pick of all the products of the world will be shown, Oregon will present the products just as they came from the fields, spectators can be their own judges as to the superior quality of the products which will be shown from any of the Oregon sections; all of the products from the Valley have been grown without irrigation, and are second to none that will be shown.

Exhibits from many of the excellent schools of Oregon will be on display in the Educational Palace. Oregon is not slow in its school features, maintaining a high standard, and accomplishing practical results. This exhibit will be represented largely by the Textile, Domestic Science, Art and Manual Training Departments of the public schools of Oregon.

The golden effect produced in the grand ensemble of the buildings of the exposition typifies the far-famed Golden state. The rare contrasts of color in the decorations of the buildings are daring and almost barbaric in their splendor.

It is a wonderful exposition, beautiful beyond description, and there will be much to charm and fascinate and compensate visitors.

Every visitor should secure his ticket through Oregon, that he may know by actual observation of conditions that the exhibits at the exposition are the common every day ordinary products. The scenery through the State of Oregon is as diverse as her products, and is very beautiful and no one should consider his trip complete without a visit to the Beaver State—Oregon—Oregon City Publicity.

Although closely connected with the operations of the gang, most of the members of which are now in prison, Cogburn was by no means the head. He admitted to Mr. Reames that he had been working under Logan's direction and had aided him in the location of many dupes upon lands declared forfeited to the government by the Oregon & California Railroad company.

In a statement to the court, Mr. Reames said he had told Cogburn that though the gang had operated in Oregon, California and Washington and that he was subject to prosecution in each state, he had arranged with the district attorneys of the states that they would not prosecute in case Cogburn was convicted in federal court.

Cogburn went by the alias of J. H. Hunter. He formerly lived at Lakeview and as agent for Logan would travel about securing applications for entry on this forfeited railroad land. A fee of $150 was exacted in each instance.

SEATTLE, Wash., Dec. 28.—A quart of blood was given by Patrolman Scott White in an effort to save the life of Patrolman Arthur K. Ruckart by transfusion of blood Sunday afternoon at Providence hospital here. This operation was successful, but a second operation to amputate one of Ruckart's legs was fatal.

LOS ANGELES, Dec. 29.—After successfully robbing another motorist of $200, a woman auto hand is at large here today in spite of a vigorous search made by the police soon after the robbery.

POSSIBILITIES OF THE VALLEY ARE RELATED

(By Morris J. Duryea, Manager Eugene Commercial Club.)

In speaking of the Willamette Valley, during the course of a speech delivered in Portland not long ago, Mr. James J. Hill said it is, in his estimation, "the most favored spot on earth for its size." While that is a strong statement, it is justified, for it would be hard to find a section of country that has been favored, or blessed, if you please, more bounteously by Nature than has this wonderful part of the great State of Oregon. Agricultural experts, men of established reputation who speak with authority, say the Willamette Valley has the greatest diversity of crop production of any section of this country. Add to this variety of production ideal climate and rare scenic beauty and you have a combination that makes this valley appeal to the homeseeker as a most desirable place in which to pitch his tent and make his home. It has seemed a paradise to the early pioneers, after the long and perilous journey over the desert and mountains on their way to this new land of promise, as it spread before them. A comprehensive exhibit of the things that can be grown, and are grown with profit, in this valley shows that the soil has a wonderful fertility both in the quantity and quality of its products. Possessing 5,000,000 acres of tillable land, much of which is untitled at the present time, the Willamette Valley offers splendid opportunities to the farmer, stockraiser, dairyman and fruitgrower. All of the eight great counties—Clackamas, Washington, Polk, Yamhill, Marion, Linn, Benton and Lane—that comprise the valley are alike in this respect, for in each of them can be found splendid possibilities for the husbandman.

It would be hard to picture a more beautiful prospect than this valley presents to the traveler who will make the journey from Portland to Eugene. Across the vista of farm and orchard he will see the mountain ranges that shelter the valley on the east and west, covered with vast forests of virgin timber. Towering against the blue of the sky line he will see the great snow-capped peaks of the Cascades, from whence come the crystal streams that water the valley. Streams that possess latent possibilities for generating power that will some day turn the wheels of the great industries that will come when this country is settled and developed. He will pass through thriving cities, substantial and up to date. Oregon City, with its "power and payroll"; Salem, the Capital City, with its beautiful broad streets and fine buildings; Albany, the "hub of the valley," where there is always something doing; Corvallis, with its big school where hundreds of young men and women are being trained to care for the farms of the valley; Eugene, railroad center and home of the university; Forest Grove, McMinnville and other smaller cities. In all of these cities he will see evidences of progress and prosperity. There is no fairer country on earth than this beautiful valley in springtime, when the orchards are in bloom and the young grain is fresh and green and one can see on every hand the signs of rural activity.

The construction of the electric lines of the Portland, Eugene & Eastern Railway and the Oregon Electric Railway is going to be an important factor in the development of the valley. The time is not far distant when the valley will be covered with a network of interurban lines, placing every farmer, as the president of one of the electric lines claims, "within half an hour of his market." This will bring about a growth of the rural districts, which means, naturally, a growth of the cities or distributing centers.

Oregon has been called the "Land of Opportunity." No section of the state offers greater opportunities to energetic men and women than does the Willamette Valley: opportunities for home making amid beautiful surroundings; opportunities to enjoy ideal climatic conditions; opportunities for money making in agricultural and industrial pursuits. The valley is capable of sustaining a large population and thousands of people will come into it in the next few years to take advantage of these opportunities. The large farms of today will be cut into small units of 40 or more acres, and farmed under modern, intensive methods. The vast acreage of tillable land will afford employment to hundreds of men who desire to make their living from the soil. From orchard and farm will come products worth millions of dollars to the people of the state. The cities will become busy industrial centers in which thousands of people will be employed; people to consume the products of the soil. When that time comes this wonderful valley will be in reality "the most favored spot on earth," filled with a happy, contented and prosperous people.—Oregon City Publicity.
