"BUY IT AT HOME"

There appears to be a wave of state patriotism sweeping over Oregon at this writing, and even the Live Wires of the Oregon City Commercial club have taken steps to inaugurate a campaign for the better patronage of home stores. The Courier, together with practically every other paper in the state, has from time to time urged its readers to trade at home, to patronize their home merchants, and to give the preference to Oregon-made goods whenever possible.

It is a well-known fact, of course, that newspapers are not run to make money, and that their chief cause for existence is to fight other people's battles without pay or recompense. (Incidentally, dear reader, this is sarcasm—but most people seem to think it should be truth.) Newspapers are supposed to battle with the mail-order houses, fight for home merchants, and print the names of all people who receive Sears-Roebuck catalogues. Nobody ever presumes that home merchants ought to advertise in the newspapers of their own town, and it apparently never enters the heads of Oregon manufacturers that the place to advertise their products is in Oregon newspapers.

The above paragraph is heaved off our chest after reading a short column in the Cottage Grove Sentinel, in which an Oregon biscuit company is patted nicely on the back because it has advertised in Oregon newspapers instead of on the billboards and in the street cars. The Cottage Grove Sentinel seems to think this new departure in advertising is worthy of comment. Maybe it is.

Perhaps, also, the Courier has been unduly fortunate. The merchants of Oregon City and Clackamas county have advertised pretty steadily in our columns. They have given us a goodly share of their patronage. Maybe they have done this because they believed in "trading at home"—and maybe they have done it because they found the Courier delivered the goods. The Courier has an idea that they have used the Courier columns because they believed that the Courier's 3,000 circulation was worth the money they paid for the privilege of availing themselves of it as an advertising medium.

All of which brings us to the meat of the matter under discussion. "Buy it at home" and "Buy it in Oregon" are excellent slogans, and should hang over the mantelpiece in every home. But there is more to it than that. No campaign against them all-order houses, or against foreign goods, can succeed if it is based on nothing else than enthusiasm. Enthusiasm evaporates more quickly than steam at the North Pole. We all know we ought to "buy at home," but some of us don't do it because we don't like the products that are offered us at home.

Oregon City merchants patronize the Courier because they find it pays. Oregon City people ought to patronize Oregon City stores because it pays. They get service in the local stores, they get consideration and personal attention, and they get good goods. As far as the local campaign is concerned, it ought to succeed. And the Courier is for it, on purely business and economical reasons.

We note, however, that the Cottage Grove Sentinel throws a verbal fit because more Oregon manufacturers don't patronize Oregon papers, and because Eastern manufacturers do. The Sentinel, apparently, would like to throw out all foreign advertising, and just boost Oregon-made goods. That is a fine spirit to have—but it is rather futile. Oregon people will buy Oregon-made goods exclusively as soon as they find that Oregon-made goods are better than other goods. But as long as Oregon-made goods are sold with a liberal sprinkling of dead flies and other dirt contained in the boxes, and as long as Oregon-canned tomatoes have nice white worms in them, just so long will the buying public purchase breakfast foods and tomatoes that didn't come from Oregon firms. And advertising won't remedy things.

"Buy it at home" and "Buy Oregon-made goods" is just half of the battle. The other half of the battle is to Oregon manufacturers. When they turn out a product that is uniformly better than any similar Eastern product, or uniformly better than any California or Washington product, they will get the business. And the newspapers will do their share in helping them get this business, too. But until this condition is brought about, all the "buy it at home" campaigns in the world will not alter the mind of the buyer.

The Courier mentions this at this time as an indication of its stand on home-boasting campaigns. In its own business the Courier tries to give service; in regard to Oregon City merchants the Courier is positive that they give real service; but as to Oregon-made goods in general, the Courier cannot support the campaign that the Cottage Grove Sentinel and other papers are making until it is convinced that Oregon-made goods are uniformly the equal of some goods that are not made in Oregon. It is not state patriotism of the right sort to urge people to buy an inferior product simply because it is made at home.

SUNDAY CLOSING

We have had quite a bit about Sunday closing lately, in fact the Oregonian has even honored the subject with front page mention. And to get on the front page of the Oregonian a thing must be very important, must be in harmony with the policy of that paper, or must be violently opposed to its policy. Hence we guess that this Sunday closing stuff is important.

Courts differ as to whether or not Oregon has a Sunday closing law, and they seem to differ on interpreting the law when they admit that there is one. And to make things the merrier, we have recently heard from a Methodist gentleman who wants to clamp on the Sunday lid by the initiative, so that everybody will have to rest on Sunday whether they want to or not.

The Courier has an idea that one day of rest in seven ought to be the privilege of every man and woman—"rest" being taken to mean freedom from regular labor on that day. But the Courier does not believe that Sunday should be made so absolute a day of rest that there would be nothing to do but go to church or sit at home and read the patent medicine almanacs. The Courier thinks the "liberal Sunday" that is so generally observed west of the Rocky Mountains, is about as happy a medium as can be found.

Getting down to the Sunday closing law, just as it stands, the Courier ventures the humble opinion that it is out-of-date and a fraud. The Sunday closing law, for instance, permits drugstores to be open, but bars department stores. Yet the modern drugstore sells fishing tackle, gymnastic apparatus, talking machines, books, pens, cameras, eye-glasses, more or less massive furniture and office fixtures, school-room fittings, toy balloons and fireworks—and incidentally drugs. Under the law the modern drugstore can stay open and flagrantly violate the spirit of Sunday legislation, while the merchant next door, who doesn't pose as a druggist, has to lock up Saturday night and stay shut till Monday morning.

Just as one example, that cannot be called justice, common sense or even good law.

And aside from that, any effort to legislate what people shall do on Sunday is just as unfair, foolish and bigoted as would be legislation regarding what people should do on Thursday. Some bright reader may now burst out and say that the Bible provides for rest on Sunday. Maybe it does and maybe it doesn't. There are quite a number of people who declare that the Bible says that rest shall come on the seventh day of the week, and not on the first as is provided in the Sunday closing law. So long as there is this conflict, it seems that it might be well to forget the Sunday law, and let common sense rule.

One day of rest in seven is all very well, especially if the person doing the resting is allowed to rest in his or her own way. But compulsory rest on Sunday, or arbitrary closing of some businesses and the opening of others on Sunday, is not all right. It would seem that in this year of grace 1915 common people might be trusted to use judgment in the matter that would be fully equal the judgment of those wise solons who in 1854 said that a butcher could keep open but a grocer could not.

DUTY NOBLY DONE

The Courier upon this occasion is glad to place a verbal laurel wreath upon the alabaster brow of the Honorable Christian Schuebel, city attorney in the county seat, and receptive candidate for the republican nomination for district attorney. Mr. Schuebel wants to be district attorney so that he may successfully administer the law, and so add to the fame he has already acquired as the friend of the common people.

Last week in Oregon City the Honorable Christian Schuebel stuck another glistening diamond in the glittering diamond of success which he wears upon his official head. He drew up a complaint, as the city's prosecuting officer, accusing the leader of a religious sect of disturbing the peace. Upon the strength of this complaint a warrant for the man's arrest was issued, and upon this complaint the defendant was tried by City Recorder Loder and found not guilty. The trial lasted the better part of half a day, close to a hundred witnesses were summoned and heard; and as the city lost the case the costs of the proceeding and all the witness fees will be hung upon the already overburdened taxpayer.

The Honorable Christian Schuebel is a lawyer of renown, deep learning and much skill and experience. It is to be presumed that he knows of the disinclination of Americans to interfere with the religious worship of other people—to say nothing of the Constitutional provisions that posi-

"CAPABLE"

In a second announcement of its "midnight-morning" edition, which will be circulated "on rural routes and in other favorable districts," the publisher of the Oregon Journal, of Portland, remarks that the bull-dog edition of the Journal will have at its service a leased wire "capable of carrying" several thousand words in eight hours. This is undoubtedly true.

Most any leased wire is "capable" of carrying 22,000 or more words of telegraph service in eight hours. Usually it depends on the skill of the operators or sending machines as to how many thousand words a leased wire will carry. And in this announcement "capable" seems to be a very excellent word.

We are glad to see this "capable" appear, for the men who will get out the Journal's morning bull-dog for circulation "on rural routes" are gossiping about their jobs at the Portland Press club. They say that the bull-dog will go to press at ten o'clock in the evening, that three men will comprise the entire editorial end, and that perhaps two pages of the regular Journal will be made over for the bull-dog.

Probably the leased wire that will be installed for the bull-dog journal is "capable" of carrying many thousand words in eight hours; but if the bull-dog goes to press at ten in the evening, it is a cinch that the capacity of the wire will not be unduly taxed. If the bull-dog Journal is going to have an eight-hour leased wire service, that service will have to start at two in the afternoon to quit at ten at night—so it is plain to be seen that the news presented to readers the next morning at the breakfast table will not be very recent or up-to-date.

Harrington, a republican; Kent Wilson, a deputy in the tax office, a republican; County Clerk Iva Harrington, a republican; County School Superintendent Callavan, a republican. Chief Deputy County Clerk, Fred Miller, a republican, acted as clerk of the city recorder's court during the trial. It is a curious fact that there were no democratic county officials at the trial—they stayed in their offices and did such work as they had to do. But the republican office holders made it a half-holiday and took in the proceedings. As we remarked before, there may be no political significance to this; but it is a curious and weird coincidence.

WHAT'S THE ANSWER?

George W. Perkins is afraid lest after the war, the cost of living in the United States be reduced. Ordinary people see little to dread in such a prospect, but Perkins is no ordinary person. He fears that the war once over, Europeans will dump a lot of goods on our shores that we can use. He wants action taken at once to prevent it. Well, no one is going to force Mr. Perkins to take any of the stuff if he doesn't want it. He will be at liberty to buy as high priced "made in America" stuff as he wants. But why should he want to prevent others with smaller incomes than he enjoys, from getting the advantage of a lower cost of living?

Perkins once said a very fine thing. While testifying before the Commission on Industrial Relations he declared that if a traveler on an airship were to see our great natural resources, comparatively small population, and the large number of unemployed, he "would think this was a lunatic asylum."

Dear Amy:-

Everyone should go to bed happy and get up happy. Then they'll work better and earn more. I feel truly sorry for people who are able, but either too stingy or too careless to buy beautiful beds and bedroom furniture.

John goes to his bed humming a tune and gets up whistling. I have such a nice room for him. That's why he is such a success in business.

With love,

Lou.

War is—etc. King George of England fell off his horse while reviewing troops. Poor kink. And a lot of real men have been shot off their horses because they were fighting for George, too.

And now they are talking of buying the death-ship "Eastland" for a naval training station for the use of the Lake Michigan Naval Reserve. Somehow we don't think that such utilization of the hulk of the "Eastland" will make many recruits to the service.

The state of Oregon has refused to give an eastern syndicate the exclusive right to gather seaweed from the ocean off the Oregon coast. It is nice to know that some state officials, at least, know where their jurisdiction ends. But we don't wonder that the easterners asked the concession.

Undoubtedly So

Editor, Courier: Congress has the power to stamp and approve all money put into circulation. How many dollars in "green backs" would it take to set every idle man to work on some government work in Oregon? We need railroads, streetcar lines, good roads, ships, steamers and automobiles to carry the United States mails, and wagons three to five dollars per day.

tively forbid such interference. When he issued the complaint in the case referred to, he knew that at the trial the Constitutional right of any person to worship God as he or she pleased would be used as a defense. Yet so sure was the Honorable Christian Schuebel of his duty and of his ability as a prosecutor that he plunged on with the case. The taxpayer foots the bills, and Chris gets the glory.

The Courier is glad that the Honorable Christian Schuebel "seen his duty and done it" as greater minds than ours have worded the action. It was a duty nobly done, without regard to cost or chance of success. It was almost as noble as the plea that the Honorable Christian Schuebel made for the stepping of the Portland jitneys, when the Portland Railway, Light & Power company inspired Mr. Templeton to hurl his "public ordinance" into the air. The Honorable Christian Schuebel said that after the smoke of battle had cleared away, and after the jitneys kept right on running, that he "had said all the time that the ordinance wouldn't stand."

If this was so, what a noble sacrifice in the line of duty it was for Chris to try and make it stand, risking by so doing the esteem of those people who were sure he would never stand shoulder to shoulder with the hated corporations in their fight against the common people.

"Printing with a punch"—at the Courier.

The Courier just mentions these little details here so that farmers who will be asked to subscribe to the bull-dog Journal will know just how "capable" the paper is when it comes to delivering news value in competition with regularly established morning newspapers.

As we said before, "capable" was a happy choice on the part of the publisher of the Oregon Evening Journal when he was telling about his proposed bull-dog edition.

NOTED IN PASSING

Perhaps there is political significance to this, and perhaps there is not. But it is a curious coincidence, anyway.

Last week there was a trial in the circuit court room. It was not a county case, but was an Oregon City case. Owing to the large number of people who wanted to hear the trial, the city borrowed the circuit court chamber for the afternoon.

And as a result of the trial business was pretty well suspended in many of the offices in the courthouse during the trial, because the people who usually occupy these offices and transact county matters therein were at the trial. Those county officials who attended the trial were:

County Judge Anderson, a republican; Sheriff Wilson, a republican; Deputy Sheriff Jack Frost, a republican; County Tax Collector George
