My Convict

By JOHN Y. LARNED

I was running my auto leisurely along a road in the country and slowed up even from that pace to turn a sharp bend in the road when suddenly a heavy weight dropped from an overhanging branch into my car directly behind me. Turning, I saw a man in convict stripes rising to his feet.

"Put on full speed," he said in a tone to indicate that he would be obeyed.

I did not see that he possessed any weapon with which to enforce his demands, but it was evident that he was an escaped jailbird and as such was likely to be desperate. As soon as I had turned the bend I obeyed his order, my speed gauge registering forty miles an hour. The man climbed over the back of the seat and sat down beside me. The road before me needed all my attention, but I took time to glance aside at him. Now that he was fleeing at so rapid a gait his whole expression was changed. Despite his stripes, I saw in him a man of refinement. He met my gaze with an honest look and said:

"My friend, if you knew that instead of defeating justice you are trying to undo a frightful act of injustice you would be better satisfied. I have been the victim of a conspiracy to defraud a bank of which I was cashier and was sent to the penitentiary for ten years. My noble wife sent me surreptitiously saws, with which I effected my escape. My object is to get out of the country, send for her and our children and begin life anew."

While he was making this brief statement I kept one eye on the road and the other on him. I doubt if any man can lie to me and impress me that he is speaking the truth. I did not know that the man was sincere, but I felt his sincerity. Knowledge may be defective; intuition, at least with me, is perfect.

"There is nothing," I replied, "that would give me greater satisfaction than to enable you to carry out your purpose. Where shall I take you?"

"First you must throw my pursuers off my track. They are not far behind."

"Get back there and cover yourself up to the chin with the wraps."

He did so, and his stripes were concealed, but he was bareheaded. I gave him my cap. Seeing a man ahead of me wearing a common woolen hat, I stopped long enough to buy it, giving him three times its value. Then, entering upon a long stretch of comparatively straight and level road, I put on the balance of my power, making fifty miles an hour.

"Do you know anything of the pursuit?" I asked.

"Only that my flight must have been discovered long ago."

"We must have another suit of clothes," was my next remark. "We shall have to stop and buy one."

My passenger gave me some idea of the sizes he had worn before his incarceration, and at the first opportunity I bought him the necessary outfit. He spoke of paying me for them some day, but I told him what I would require would be his vindication or, at least, a surety that he was what he purported to be. He managed to change his clothes under the wraps and, crossing a bridge, threw his stripes into water flowing rapidly after this I decreased my speed somewhat, for I believed that with the start and advantage we possessed my man would not be retaken, at least for some time.

Passing through a town where I had business acquaintances, I procured funds and supplied him with what he would require. Then, stopping at a railway station, I secured a time table showing trains for New York and, by taking a longer route than the rails put him on a train without his being obliged to wait at a station.

Meanwhile he had given me the address of his wife and asked me to call upon her to receive confirmation of his story. When he parted from me his efforts to express his gratitude overcame him, and he could say nothing. All he could do was to look it.

As soon as he had left me I began to realize my position in having aided a convict to make good his escape, and it was then that doubts began to trouble me. I did not go to see his wife for a considerable time after he and I parted, fearing that she might be watched and my visit would put the authorities on to my infringement of the law. I saw in the newspapers notices of the escape from prison of a bank embezzler, and after the stir had quieted down I made the call.

Some time after my call I received a letter written with great caution from the convict, mailed at an inland city of South America. He was paying the way to send for his wife and children, which would be a difficult matter with out putting the authorities on his track.

His plan was never carried out, for one of the conspirators who had ruled him was brought to trial for certain irregularities, and the facts of the other matter came out. The convict's wife applied for a new trial for her husband, but by this time the whole matter was patent. Instead of a new trial it was decided to apply for a pardon. This, after much delay, was granted, and the pardoned man returned to his home.

I had the satisfaction of giving the reunited family a ride in the very auto that had made good the father's escape.

"DEAD" SON RETURNS

Canby Couple Overcome when Lost Boy Walks in Front Door

Harley Sturgis, the son of Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Sturgis, of Canby, walked in through the front door of his parents' home Monday night. His mother, 61 years of age, dropped unconscious from the shock, and his father was also temporarily stunned by the son's appearance, and Dr. Dedman was hastily called to attend them.

The return of Harley Sturgis proved such a shock because on May 17 his parents had mournfully gone to a funeral over what they believed to be the remains of their boy. They had paid all honor to the dead form that lay in the coffin, and had grieved sincerely over the empty clay form that was laid at rest in the family plot.

The body buried as Sturgis was identified in Eugene as the missing son of the Sturgis family by A. J. Burdette, a neighbor and friend who knew the Sturgis boy well. Now that the mistake has been discovered, much mystery surrounds the identity of the body buried in the Sturgis plot.

Harley Sturgis is 42 years old, and two years ago was committed to the state insane asylum following a temporary aberration of his mind. Early this year he wandered away from the institution, and later when the body of a man answering his description was found near Eugene, it was thought that he had died. It appears however, that after leaving the asylum Sturgis regained complete use of his faculties, and eventually discovering that he was far away from home, determined to rejoin his parents.

MODERN JOURNALISM

How Oregon's "Greatest Newspaper" Tells the News These Days

"The darkness in which the police were moving was made more impenetrable."

"Great progress was made in this direction."

"This explosion was destined to cast the debris of doubt."

"The evidence was not shattered."

"Its grewsome contents were taken."

"Picked up the loose ends of the tangled skein of evidence."

"Knocking the web in which they hope to capture the murderer."

"What's it all about? Well, we'll tell you. It isn't taken from the latest 'penny dreadful' or 'dime novel.' No, far be it from such—it is taken from the front page of the Oregonian of Monday morning, in which a reporter was endeavoring to say, as lengthily as possible, that the police didn't know very much about the latest Portland murder."

Isn't that fine newspaper style?

GLADSTONE WONT

Extension Plans of Residence City Go Glimmering at Meeting

Gladstone will not spread all over the map until it takes in a million dollars' worth of assessed valuation.

This was determined at a meeting of those interested, held last week, when the plan was discussed. The people most effected by the proposition failed to see any great merit in it for themselves, and objected to being taxed to help the present Gladstone. So, after some discussion, the plan was dropped.

Gladstone had hoped to find outside sentiment favorable to being annexed, and planned to stretch its borders to the river and north to Glen Echo, and also perhaps to the south as far as the Oregon City line. Sixty-two outside property owners would have voted on the matter, but at last week's meeting it developed that a majority of these outside people were against the idea—so that was all there was to it.

WIND STOPS TRAINS

Willamette Valley Southern Service Tied Up During Gale

Saturday night, when the wind tried to break all records for velocity and force, the Willamette Valley Southern railway lay down and went to sleep in the dark, and passengers on a stalled train somewhere near Molalla wished that there were dining and sleeping cars in the road's equipment.

The trouble was all due to a big tree, which blew down across the River Mill power line, snapping the wires and putting the whole system to sleep.

Emergency crews were sent out, and after considerable pioneering in the wild country, found the break and got temporary connections made so that juice could be sent along the trolley wires and start the stalled cars.

In addition to this, the high wind of Saturday night did considerable damage throughout the county, blowing down fruit trees, fences and small out-buildings.

JENNINGS LODGE ASPIRES

Settlement on Interurban Line Will soon Vote on Incorporation

Jennings Ledge, the next town of consequence this side of Oak Grove, is considering incorporating itself into a regular city. A meeting will be held shortly to consider this matter, and petitions for an election will be circulated. Jennings Ledge feels that it should have municipal betterments, and figures that by incorporating it will get them sooner than by any other method.

It is reported that the boundaries of the proposed new city will cover a considerable territory, reaching from the hills to the river, and south along the river bank to the mouth of the Clackamas. If these boundaries are adhered to, Jennings Ledge will steal some of Gladstone's nearby territory, and will give that city quite a race in the battle for interurban honors.

Mr. and Mrs. S. U. Dennison, of Victoria, B. C., were among the week's county seat visitors.

MAYBE THIS IS RIGHT

Correspondent Has Plan for Bettering Roads Throughout County

Editor, Courier: I have read with more or less interest articles which have appeared in your paper regarding Clackamas county's roads. I have also read other papers, and I note that the Courier has a distaste for hard surface roads and an equal distaste for roads that we at present endure. Permit me to suggest, therefore, that it might be a good plan for us to keep on levying taxes for road work in the future as we have in the past; but with this difference.

After levying and collecting the taxes, DON'T SPEND THE MONEY. Put it in the bank and let it draw interest, and when it draws enough so that it has grown to a good-sized wad, draw it out and lay hard surface roads with it. If we can get along with the roads in their present shape, we could probably continue to do so until we got enough money to lay really good ones. Hoping this plan will meet with favor, I am: FARMER.

(Editor's note: Our correspondent has got a good idea, and also a poor one, as we see it. He says the Courier has a "distaste for hard surface roads." We beg his pardon, but we haven't. The only distaste that the Courier has is for bonding the county for a huge sum to lay a minimum amount of hard surface roads. Hard surface roads themselves are all right with the Courier, and this paper would like to see some hard surface road laid each year. Maybe the correspondent's idea of holding road moneys until enough is on hand for hard surface work is a good one—that is for the taxpayers to decide. But the Courier does believe that further expenditure of road money to build such roads as we have had in the past is a waste. This paper thinks a mile or two of durable roadwork in a year would be far better than the miles and miles of road tinkering which we now pay for. If hard surface road can be laid in each district each year—even if only a quarter of a mile can be put down—the Courier would welcome and praise such a plan.)

NEW BREAKFAST FOOD

Apple Seeds May Soon Be Served with Sugar and Cream for "Mush"

J. P. Kelley, the man who discovered a use for cels, and who spent many busy months in his small factory on the river bank making chicken-food out of the dead wrigglers, has made another discovery—in fact he has made several of them. Now he is interested not only in dead eels, but in dead salmon and punk apples as well.

Mr. Kelly has found that a serviceable chicken food can be made out of salmon eggs, just as well as from dead eels; and from now until the close of the canning season he will buy all the salmon eggs he can get and turn them into stuff that will make hens cackle.

And as for apples, Mr. Kelly may be looked upon as the savior of several Oregon apple booms. He can utilize wormy apples, unripe apples, apples that are over-ripe, and apples that can't be sold. By a process of his own he dissolves apples into their component parts, and makes things from these divisions.

Out of the skins he makes a jelly-producing substance, which he says will prove an excellent material upon which to erect a quivering and tempting desert. Likewise, from other portions of the useless apple he extracts albumen, which is worth considerable money, and which may be used in the manufacture of fake eggs.

And as for the apple seeds, he can make a number of things from them.

Hulled apple seeds may be transformed into a breakfast food that will beat any patented article on the market. Hulled apple seeds can also be salted and served as an after-dinner delicacy. Or the seeds may be dried and strung on thread and made into ornamental necklaces, lace edging, dress trimming, "jet" or fancy jewelry.

When Mr. Kelly gets around to it, he will build a factory for the composite development of dead eels, punk apples and salmon eggs, and then Clackamas county will have an industry that will produce generous dividends, and also dispose of many waste products.

THE "DEMON" AT WORK

Story that the Prohib Haven Yet Found Is Here Revealed

Prohibitionists—both the professional kind and those who really mean it—have told us that the European war has put the double-cross on the Demon Rum for good in the old world and they cite the abolishment of vodka in Russia and the curtailment of ale and booze in England as proof thereof. But they have missed something, and the Courier is glad to call it to their attention.

One of the recent magazines contained a thrilling account of some of the fighting in France, and described how one of the armies prepares for a charge. After the continued bombardment of the enemy's trenches, said this article, the soldiers who were about to charge were served with a good healthy drink of rum and chloroform.

With this mixture of fumes fogging their brains, the soldiers would sweep across the space between the trenches, try to climb over between barbed-wire entanglements, and otherwise demonstrate that they didn't know what they were doing and didn't care.

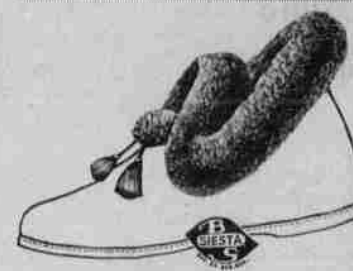

If rum and chloroform will do this for a man, why doesn't the prohibition propaganda make some mention of it? It strikes us to be good stuff—just as good as the "see-what-whiskey-does-to-your-stomach" stuff that they used to teach us in school.

A girl in New York got anthrax from wearing unclean furs about her neck. Some of us are fortunate, and can't afford furs. Style has its perils.

OREGON STOCK WINS

Sheep from Agricultural College Make Envious Record at Fair

Sheep from the Agricultural College have been added to the long list of Oregon winners at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. A telegram from O. M. Nelson, in charge of the Animal Husbandry exhibit at the Exposition, says that important places were taken by the sheep as follows:

Pure-bred Shropshire yearling wethers, first, second and third; pen of three pure-bred Shropshire yearling wethers, first and championship; pure-bred Shropshire fat lamb, second, fifth and sixth; pen of grade lambs, second and third; and carlot of fat lambs, third.

In addition to these winnings the College sheep commanded a good price from discriminating buyers for the sales made. Four pure-bred Shropshire ewe lambs were sold to Nolan & Finch, of Soda Springs, Idaho, winners of first in carlot fat lambs, at $50 each, and the pen of wether lambs was sold for fancy mutton at 10¢ cents per pound.

Great interest centered in the carlot class. Nolan & Finch have cleaned up in this class all over the country, notably at the great shows of Chicago and Denver. They are extensive growers and breeders, having thousands of animals to make up their exhibition lot from, while some of the college and university exhibits were made up from very small flocks. Second place was taken by the Butterfield Livestock Company, of Weiser, Idaho, and fourth and fifth places were won by the University of California.
