DAIRYING AND SOIL CULTURE

FEED FOR CALVES.

Grain and Roughage Should Be Provided at Two Weeks of Age.
(Prepared by United States department of agriculture.)

Usually a vigorous calf begins during the second week to pick at the bedding or other material within its reach, and at that time both grain and roughage of the best possible quality should be provided. Clover hay, alfalfa hay, or, if these are not available, the most palatable roughage on hand, should be given the calf after the second week, according to farmers' bulletin 777. If alfalfa is used care should be taken that it does not cause scours. This feed should be fed sparingly at first and increased only after the calf gets accustomed to it. The essential points are that the roughage be of good quality and kept clean. Hay should be furnished at first only a handful at a time and placed so that it cannot get soiled. A lattice-work rack of metal or wood is useful if it is placed high enough from the floor so that the calf cannot soil the hay in any manner but still have it within easy reach. For the first six months at least the calf should receive all the roughage of good quality that it will eat up clean. The quantity taken up to the time it is one month old is very small. The rack should be emptied every day and fresh roughage supplied.

In the accompanying illustration of sanitary quarters for dairy calves are shown concrete floor, clean bedding and plenty of light and ventilation. Silage and grain in concrete feeding trough in front of inclosure.

Silage may be given after the calf is one month old, but the utmost care should be observed to be sure that it is fresh from the silo. For this reason very young calves, except in the hands of a very careful feeder, should not be fed silage, as it ferments rapidly.

If the calf has access to a good pasture during the first six months it need not receive other roughage. Pastures used in summer should contain plenty of shade. It is not advisable, however, to have a calf under two months of age on pasture in the early spring.

Wheat bran is eaten steadily by young calves. Inasmuch as one of the essential points is to induce the calf to eat grain as early as possible, bran in many cases is one of the ingredients in the mixture. Corn, a feed very commonly found on the farm, has an excellent physiological effect upon cattle of all ages and to a great extent may take the place of the fat removed from the milk. It is therefore one of the very best grains to use with skim milk. Experiments in Virginia tend to show that corn fed to calves should be cracked rather than finely ground. Cracked corn and wheat bran therefore should be the basis of the feed mixture. Ground oats are very good for the purpose, but they are not grown on the farm so commonly as corn and in many cases cost much more per unit of feed than corn and bran. The following mixtures are recommended:

Three parts cracked corn and one part wheat bran, three parts cracked corn, one part wheat bran and one part ground oats; three parts cracked corn, one part wheat bran, one part ground oats and one part linseed meal; five parts cracked corn, one part wheat bran, one part ground oats and one part blood meal; oats, ground.

When the calf is in its second week it should begin to receive grain, and when one month old it should eat about half a pound a day. After this time the quantity of grain may be gradually increased, feeding the calf all that it will take until three pounds a day is reached. This will probably be some time during the third month. Grain when fed with separated milk should never be put into the milk.

Feeding Dry Cows.

Dry cows can be maintained on hay and silage or roots. It is profitable, however, to feed cows a sufficient amount of grain during the dry period to have them in good physical condition at calving time. Cows should be dry for six to eight weeks prior to calving. It does not pay to have them dry for a longer period.

INJUSTICE OF BONDS

Mr. Hicinbotham Would Insist on Keeping Automobile Tax at Home

Oregon City, Route 2, May 5; to The Editor:—In last week's Courier I read an article headed "Good Roads Again" over the signature of "Good Roads Committee." Now, I don't know who this "committee" is, but, with your consent, I should like to tell the voters of the state what I think of this $8,000,000 bonding bill through the Courier. There doesn't appear to be but very little sound argument in favor of this bill. Commencing right at the introduction of the bill, where it says, "People have chance to get chain of roads, Multnomah gets none. All of money derived from sale of securities will be spent outside, while 40 per cent of the cost is paid here." The whole wording, after you study the bill carefully, and study the map, appears to be delusive and deceptive, and the article in last week's Courier has the same ring to it. The fact that the whole thing is unjust makes it impossible to make it show up in any other light, after you study the bill and map carefully. If the voters of the state will take time to examine this bill and map before election, there are no smooth, deceptive words that the advocates of the bill can use that can throw the voters off the right track for their own interest. This bill favors a few at the expense of many and to the detriment of many. The taxpayers of every county in the state, who wish to improve their roads to market, have got to make up the amount of every automobile license that is taken from that county and applied to the construction of those hard-surfaced roads that are mentioned in this bonding bill. And that occurs every year, after this bill is put into effect. The automobile license could be used to build and keep in repair our roads to market, which would be a source of both pleasure and profit to every farmer and laboring man in the state and would greatly tend to cut down the cost of farm products to consumers in the cities. This automobile license that is applied to these hard-surfaced roads that are mentioned in the bonding bill reduces the revenue of every county and city in the state, just the amount of all the licenses taken from that county or city, and all that revenue has got to be made up by the taxpayers of that county or city. The farmers are all interested in getting good roads to the markets, or to the depots of the transportation lines, but it is not for the best interests of the people of the state to try to keep up hard-surfaced roads right along by the side of the main transportation lines. We do not want to try to maintain any competition to the main transportation lines of the state. They are our friends and we should try and support them, and these hard-surfaced roads, right along by the side of them is in direct opposition to their interests, and ours too. Those deceptive and delusive words that are used right at the heading of the bonding bill, in regard to Multnomah not getting any of these roads, while she was paying 40 per cent of the costs of building them, looks very tempting at first until you study the bill and the map carefully. Then you discover that the whole network of hard-surfaced roads terminate right at the Multnomah line on every side of Portland. Five hard-surfaced roads, the way they have it fixed, run right into Portland, and the whole thing is just an extension of Portland's big sporting driveways, and the may is so laid out and specified in the bill that the highway commission has no right of choice where these hard-surfaced roads should be, for the best interests of the state, but they have got to be put right where they are designated on the map and in the bill. And the bill is so worded that all this automobile license tax has to be used on these hard-surfaced roads.

In case the money derived from the sale of these bonds is used up before the interest on the bonds becomes due, then the commission is authorized to use any funds that may be at its disposal, no matter from what source it came, to pay this interest with, also the principal payments, when they become due, and there is no provision in the bill for returning the money so used out of other funds to make the semiannual interest and principal payments with. Now, you can readily see that under these conditions that all these Post and Forest roads that are marked out so lavishly all over the state will be likely to have pretty short picking, unless other bonds are authorized continually to raise money to work in cooperation with the federal fund for building these roads. Not one dollar of this automobile license tax can be used on these past and forest roads, which are of so much interest to all rural inhabitants.

What justice is there in taking all this automobile tax away from the rural districts and putting it on this hard-surfaced sporting driveway, that will be of no benefit to the rural communities, when they need it so badly to improve their own roads? Let us insist on keeping our own automobile license tax. We want good roads, as well as the sports of Portland do, and we have a right to them.

GEORGE HICINBOTHAM.

Anthony-Keil Wedding

An impressive wedding was solemnized Sunday, April 29, at 2 o'clock at Canby, Ore., when Miss Clara Keil was united in marriage to Roy Anthony at the home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. R. Keil. The ring service was read by Rev. F. Lucas of the German Lutheran church beneath a bower of cherry blossoms, lilies and daffodils, forming a lovely setting for the occasion.

Abundance of spring flowers, narcissus and ferns were artistically arranged about the home. The bride was charmingly dressed in a frock of wisteria toned georgette crepe and carried a shower bouquet of bride's roses and sweet peas, and was given in marriage by her father, R. Keil. Mrs. Etta Burns of Portland acted as matron of honor and Miss Santa Nickel as bridesmaid. Both wore tailored suits with corsage of forget-me-nots and pink rose buds. Earl Anthony and Fred Moeller of Portland attended the groom. After the ceremony a delicious wedding dinner was served to 50 intimate relatives and friends. Many beautiful gifts were received by the young bridal couple.

How a Regiment Was Saved

By RICHARD MACKLEY

In a little town near the Russian border Colonel Ullendorf was encamped with his regiment. There was at the time no enemy very near him, and he sent for his daughter, Sonia, to come from Moscow to visit him. But the pan-European war was on, and there might be fighting at any moment. So the colonel wrote his daughter to come with as little baggage as possible and be ready to get back at short notice.

When Sonia came she was escorted by Paul Schumsky, a citizen. "Didn't I write you," said the colonel, "not to bring any useless baggage?"

"Yes, papa."

"Then what did you bring that weakling for?"

"Well, he offered to be my protector, and I—"

"Protector! Do you suppose that whippersnapper could protect any one? Why, he'd need a nurse himself."

"If he needs one I'll take care of him."

The very next day the colonel's attention was diverted from Schumsky to an attack of the enemy. He had barely time to tell his daughter to get back to Moscow as fast as possible when he was called upon to head his regiment in battle.

The Russian position was on a low ridge that rose above the surrounding country. The Germans straightway began to make a pair of pincers of themselves, their favorite strategy, driving in the Russian flanks. When they had their enemy in the shape of a horseshoe they proceeded to drive in the heels and soon cut off the Russian communications. Colonel Ullendorf, realizing that unless he could be reinforced his command would be captured, was in despair. He sent several officers to the rear to beg for succor, but none of them got through. When he was meditating surrender he was told that a man in citizen's dress had come from the rear and desired to speak with him. Then who should appear but Paul Schumsky, his clothes half torn off his back, dirty, begrimed with powder and blood.

"Great Scott!" cried the colonel.

"How did you get through?"

"Fought my way."

"With a message?"

"Yes, colonel."

"A promise of reinforcements?"

"No, colonel."

"Then what in thunder is it?"

"I proposed marriage to your daughter, and she referred me to you."

A group of officers standing about broke into a laugh. The colonel looked as if he didn't know whether to laugh or to cut the citizen down with his sword. Presently an idea struck him. "Since you have come through, may be you can go back."

"I can try."

"Well, go back and send me reinforcements. If you succeed you shall have my daughter."

Scarcely had the words been spoken when Schumsky betook himself to the rear so rapidly that it occurred to those viewing him that his legs were a great advantage to him. Being on an eminence, they could see him at a great distance. A German horseman saw him and gave chase. The ground was rough, and Schumsky was a better jumper than the horse. Then he sprang over a field, rising popping at him on both sides. He fell, but got up and went on, this time with a limp.

Ullendorf started for him, but he led them into a strip of timber, emerging on the other side, while they remained in the wood. Again he fell, and when he arose he limped some more. Finally he disappeared from view in the distance and was not seen again. The colonel, who had been watching him through a pair of glasses, lowered them and muttered:

"If he gets us succor he can have Sonia, and I'd give him a dozen other daughters if I had them. Thank heaven, night is coming on! The enemy can't drive us to the wall before morning."

Soon after daylight the sound of firing was heard in the Russian rear, and after awhile a force was seen constituting a wedge that was driving apart the heels of the German horse-shoe. The approaching line advanced rapidly, and the colonel, mounting his horse, rode to meet it. There he found the officer in command, who was being piloted by Paul Schumsky. Paul cut a ridiculous figure. He wore a derby hat, a hoptail coat and spats over his shoes.

"I've won her, colonel!" he said enthusiastically, waving his hat.

The colonel gave him a look of mingled admiration, contempt and gratitude.

"Yes, you've won," he said in a snarling tone, "but go and get off that tattered and put yourself into a uniform before I go back on my word."

With that he turned to the officer commanding the reinforcements for consultation. The result was that the Germans were driven off and Colonel Ullendorf's regiment was saved from capture.

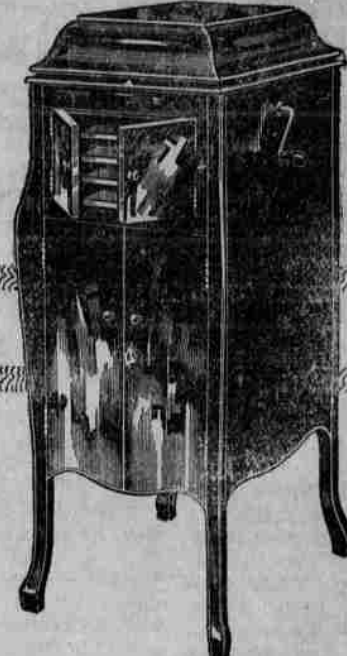

Before the colonel would permit the marriage between Schumsky and his daughter Sonia was forced to enlist and was soon after promoted to a commission. It seems that Sonia, who had been bothered with his begging her to say yes, in order to get rid of him, had told him to go ask her father, never dreaming that he would do so. However, her father would not hear of her going back on her word, and she finally willingly married the man who had saved the regiment.

turn from a short honeymoon trip, will make their home at New Era, Oregon, where Mr. Anthony is connected with the Dornbecker Manufacturing company. The marriage of Mr. Anthony and his bride is the result of a romance which began in school 15 years ago, when both were small children.

Two Seek to Sever Matrimonial Bonds and Bondage

Freta Callahan Stultz was helping her husband in a bakery in a little southern Oregon town when she inherited Clackamas county land; because she would not mortgage the property to provide money for high life, her complaint states, her husband was cruel to her. She had married A. L. Stultz at John Day, Ore., on November 21, 1915, and from the first, she says, he was jealous and many times accused her of infidelity, winding up their matrimonial adventures by deserting her. Mrs. Stultz asks $150 as costs and $50 a month alimony.

Masie M. Casto Tuesday filed suit for divorce from John J. Casto, to whom she was married at Oregon City on January 31, 1912. Cruelty is the allegation. Judge Campbell Tuesday signed a divorce decree separating Cleora E. McBane and J. McBane.
