CHICKEN PEN GONE

Templeton Sticks to Cause Until Unsightly Thing is Removed

There were no mourners when Street Commissioner Charles Babcock hitched a sturdy team of horses to the little shed that blocked Seventh street in front of the municipal elevator and hauled that unsightly and perfectly useless decoration to a premature grave beneath the suspension bridge. Councilman Henry M. Templeton started action against the location of the shed immediately after it was erected to cover a popcorn wagon, and upon investigation failed to find any of the city officials who were responsible for giving permission for its construction. The councilman labeled the thing a "chicken coop" and demanded of the council that it be removed.

An attempt ensued to saddle the task of removing it onto every man in the city's employ and after much coaxing Mr. Babcock shouldered the job, when property owners became insistent. The electric wires were cut Sunday morning and horses hitched to the structure. The L. L. Stansbury Co., will do business beneath the bridge, if at all, for the time being.

HOOVERITE ASKS THAT ALL KEEP FEW HENS

Oregon City, Dec. 10, 1917. To the Editor: We are threatened with a meat famine—in fact it is actually upon us, for all but the wealthy. And in the midst of it all the average American goes right on overlooking the one best bet in the way of supplying a quick-growing, wholesome meat. I refer to poultry and eggs.

The average family, for some reason not wholly clear, would rather grow flowers in the back yard, which, granted, are good to look upon but not worth a cent from a food standpoint or as a help to winning the war. Some families will shiftlessly allow the back yard to grow up in weeds, which not only are unsightly but not good to eat and really an absolute menace, rather than go to a little trouble and the imaginary humiliation of having a few hens and growing chicks.

There is a wasteful tendency to throw table scraps into the garbage cans, rather than feed them to a flock of laying hens in the back yard. The argument has been raised that poultry consumes good grain that should be used in making bread, etc. While chickens will, of course, eat the best grade of grains and feed, they do not demand it, thriving quite well on the poorer quality of grains and seeds, table scraps and meat scraps from the butcher shops, articles of food that would otherwise be wasted. The hen will take these poorer grades of feeds and seeds and turn them into the "queen of breakfast foods," the fresh egg.

Fresh eggs are practically sure to sell for $1 per dozen the coming winter. Why? Not especially because of the high prices of grains, but because, as in many other cases, we have left the supply to such a limited number of producers to produce. In other words, the eaters are away out of proportion to the producers. This should not be. You can't keep a hog in your back yard, or a steer, or a flock of sheep, but you can and should keep a few hens.

Some people may claim that it does not pay with prices of grain, etc., as high as at present. On the U. S. department of agriculture farm at Beltsville, Md., an extensive test covering an entire year during which time feed prices were way up, showed that the cost of feed per dozen eggs produced by Leghorns averaged about 13 cents and for the larger breeds, or general purpose fowls, it averaged 17 cents.

Have prices of eggs been low enough at any time during the year to admit of any doubt as to the profitability of poultry when authorities like the U. S. department of agriculture prove that the cost of producing a dozen eggs does not exceed the figures given above? So fall in line—keep as many hens as your space will allow—help to win the war—and at the same time help to put Mr. "High Cost of Living" out of business.

A Hooverite.

DIVORCE COURT SLACKS UP FOR HOLIDAY WEEKS

The spreading dawn of a beautiful Christmas has draped its charitable mantle over the reposing form of the divorce evil in our delightful county until the Yuletide season shall have passed and the toys of childhood's heaven shall have been battered and beaten into sad disuse. All of which is to say that Judge Campbell's well-known divorce mill hasn't been grinding the usual grist since our outburst of last week.

On Friday Grace C. Girt became the sole owner of the following described personal property, to-wit and namely, one pillow, two bed sheets and half of the canned fruit. This was done by a cruel order of the court divorcing Grace C. Girt from her husband, James E. Girt. In addition to these popular household appurtenances, Mrs. Girt comes into title of $800 by reason of real property division and gets the custody of a minor child.

Albert G. Graham, who married Emma M. Graham, at Philadelphia, Pa., on July 13, 1898, late Monday filed a divorce complaint charging desertion, dating from October 22, 1903. The custody of Honey, 19 years old, and Albert G., Jr., 15, is involved.

Bertha Morse, married to William Henry Morse at Chehalis, Wash., on November 23, 1915, Saturday filed suit for divorce. Desertion is charged.

Judge Campbell on Saturday signed a decree separating Josephina and Emilio Boitano, a Sandy couple. Mrs. Boitano will have custody of two minor children. A decree was issued at the same time in the case of Wayne W. Eicholtz and May Harrington, alias May Eicholtz. The former charged that he had married May Harrington before she had been divorced from a former husband a sufficient length of time. The marriage was annulled.

John William and Della C. Stafford enjoyed three years of married bliss and then Mrs. Stafford left her husband to cook his own meals. They were married at Los Angeles in December of 1913 and on Wednesday Mr. Stafford filed suit for divorce.

YOUTH SUES AUNT

Charges Demand an Accounting of Funds Trained Since Childhood

George Toedemeier Tuesday filed suit against his aunt, Amelia Toedemeier, demanding an accounting of a fund left in her keeping since the time he was 9 years of age. It is alleged that the youth made an agreement with his aunt for her to take charge of his savings until he should become of age. Having reached that state he demands to know what had become of the money he earned in the interval.

STATE BUDGET INCLUDES USUAL SERIES OF ITEMS

The total expense of administering the state government for 1918 will be $3,454,252.09, and of this sum $2,866,205 must be raised by taxation, according to the state levy made Tuesday afternoon by the state tax commission. The balance will be derived from other receipts and totals $598,047.09.

The total administration expense exceeds that of this year by $121,160.59, and the sum to be raised by taxation exceeds this year's levy by $156,955. In mills the average levy will be 3.076. The tax levy made absorbs all of the 6 per cent increase allowed under the 6 per cent tax limitation amendment.

Because of the $50,000,000 increase in the valuation of the state the institutions dependent on a millage tax will enjoy larger revenues next year. The Monmouth Normal school received from the millage tax this year $35,150.56, while next year it will receive $37,144.29. The state road levy next year will total $292,151.39, while this year it was $219,690.98. The millage tax of the Oregon Agricultural college this year totaled $351,505.58, and next year it will receive $371,442.23. The University of Oregon this year received $263,929.18, and next year it will receive $278,581.67.

The usual $20 is appropriated in the budget for the McLoughlin home in Oregon City.

TELLS HARDSHIPS OF "SOUR-DOUGHS"

meter the mercury will run down into the bulb and freeze solid.

In a temperature of 80 degrees below zero no living thing can long endure in the open. Even the hardy bears and wolves hunt holes and remain until the weather moderates. Men long exposed to the awful cold may survive for a time, only to die with lung disease later on. The intense cold breathed in the open freezes or chills the lung lining, and later on the victim will contract bronchitis, pneumonia or quick consumption.

One prospector told me he was caught in a blizzard and remained for five days in an abandoned mining cabin. He said evidently a white woman or squaw had once resided there, for the interior had been clothed and papered with newspapers. And he spent the most of the time reading those walls. He would read up as far as he could see, then stand on the table and read up to the roof, read newspapers that were printed ten years before. He told me that one morning he opened the slide window and threw the dish-water out and when it struck the ground it was ice. This is a whopper for a man who has never experienced a winter up around the arctic circle, but I will believe any story told in Alaska, when told the first time.

Another miner told me that the extreme cold had forced him and his partner to abandon their thawing fires and wait for warmer weather. One morning he thought to fix a dog sled that was standing just outside the cabin. He reached out to get it and his hand came in contact with the sled shoe. It was frozen to the metal in an instant. The sled was brought inside and his hand released by warming the metal but he said he had a dangerous sore from the burn.

When the thermometer is far below zero and there is no wind it is astonishing how far sound will carry. The howl of a dog can be heard further than the eye can see, and men can converse more than a mile apart.

Sometimes there is game to be had in the prospecting camps, and sometimes a man might hunt for a month and never see a sign of bear, caribou or any other animal. Like gold, game is where you find it in Alaska, and it is fully as uncertain as gold.

Every year a large number of crazy men are brought out of Alaska and taken to Portland, Oregon. There is not a town on the Yukon that has not sent out one or many "bugs." Two things are given as the causes for the brain storms—brooding and solitude. And it is rather remarkable that about 90 per cent of these men recover in from six months to two years' treatment in the "bug" sanitarium in Portland.

Many men buy Indian women and marry them, to prevent insanity. "We play cards to hold our brains together until we hate the sight of each other, then we buy wives and separate," explained one miner to me.

Let two men work together and live together day after day, or rather night after night of the long dayless winter, and after a time they become sullen, morose, quarrelsome. They will go for days without hardly a spoken word. The darkness, solitude and cold have a peculiar influence on men. The firmest of friends will quarrel over a trifle and be sullen for days. One will get mad if his partner talks too much and will fly into a passion if he is pouty and does not talk. They will quarrel over the most unimportant details and often separate over a trifling argument. Anywhere else but in this solitude these men would fight to the last for each other.

And with ice and snow everywhere, the miners of Alaska really suffer for want of water. The only water they have during the winter is snow water, thawed, and this is too often too much trouble for men who work from 15 to 18 hours per day. It is too often too much trouble for men who sit idly in their cabins day after day. Hence it is a fact men do not drink enough water to be healthy during the long winters, and as for having enough to keep their bodies and their dishes in healthy condition—forget it.

20th CENTURY GROCERY,

Oregon City, Oregon

There are men in Alaska who haven't had a bath in years.

When a pair first starts on a prospecting hole their one topic of conversation, night and day, is what they will strike and what they will do when they strike. After a time neither will dare speak the word "gold" or mention his hopes. It is peculiar how the hard grind and the monotony go to one's head.

Let a cabin run out of tobacco and the men are more concerned than over a shortage of food. As the supply runs low the partners will declare it is a good time to quit. When it becomes exhausted they will pick up disgraced cuds around the cabin, dry them and smoke them, and when it is all gone, one or perhaps both will risk their lives through long trips over the mountains to the nearest town.

Seattle prices double when the product reaches the river stores, and double again when they are packed into the mining camps back from the river, so it can be readily seen why war prices are driving men out of Alaska by hundreds. When bacon reaches a dollar a pound no prospector can afford it, and but few of the richest of the working claims can.

Some of these days when the war is over and there is an over supply of dirigibles and airplanes, Alaska is going to have a thorough searching out in the remote places where white men dare not go now. These fliers during the summer season will go down the streams of unknown places, and over the mountains to unexplored valleys, and they will be able to carry in enough provisions and supplies to warrant thorough prospecting of these far-back localities—places that absolutely cannot be prospected now for the reason that the outfits cannot carry supplies enough over the trails and roughest of all countries to keep the prospectors eating for a long enough time. The fear of starvation holds many a man back from exploration. He dares not go further for fear that he may not be able to come back, that unforeseen difficulties may delay and he may starve and freeze—and starvation is the one nightmare of the Alaskan prospector.

With fliers it will be possible during the summer months to explore the great white wastes on the Alaskan map, to go up beyond the arctic circle to the Arctic ocean, and to prospect every valley and stream. There is no doubt but what there are many strikes as rich as the Klondike waiting for someone to find them, and with air machines making this possible, Alaska will no doubt be thoroughly explored.

War time prices have played the devil with the Yukon river merchants. In these interior towns wants must be anticipated, or guessed at, months ahead and the goods for the coming winter must be ordered months ahead. This year the excessive prices in the mining camps have forced many of the small concerns, with low grade dirt, to quit, to simply shut down and go outside until the war ends and prices lower, hence many a storekeeper, with the customary winter stock on hand, finds there are very few to buy his goods and the bills are coming due. And a result will be that many a dealer with small capital and credit will go broke.

Next week I will write about Nome—a mining camp that sprung up like a mushroom in the night; a camp that was only equalled by Dawson as the greatest gold producing spot on earth, and a gold city that has "gone bust."

lod of any strike of former employees of said mill."

Mr. Hawley said Friday: "Our whole aim has been, and especially in this unfortunate labor trouble, to be fair, and we have passed by many unpleasant things. But we feel as though we would not be doing ourselves justice in passing up the present accusations without setting the public right."

Nineteen of the men employed by Mr. Peterson are said to have made affidavits after their arrival here that the true conditions had been misrepresented to them. They had already received their transportation to Oregon City, and when they declined to work were given their fares back to Seattle.

SPRUCE PASSES LOCKS

Giant of the Forest Becomes Eyes of World in Form of Airplanes

The Romance of a Spruce Tree, might well be the subject of a story about a raft of spruce logs that passed through the federal locks at Oregon City on Tuesday, bound for Portland. The raft contained 1000 feet of choice spruce timber, towed behind the steamer Wauna, to be converted into fine lumber for the manufacture of airplanes for service on the battle fronts of Europe.

Oregon is coming into prominence in the affairs of the war department as the source of most of the spruce that is being turned into airplanes by the government, and the raft that passed through here Tuesday is just one of scores that are to be taken to mills at Portland and elsewhere. Indeed, a spruce log has varied and interesting experiences before, in finished form, it is to become a target for Hun bullets. From the giant of the forest its transformation makes it the giant of the air—the veritable "eyes of the world," and the carrier of some of America's bravest young men; young men who risk their lives in mid-air for the sake of precious information for the fighting forces on land and sea.
