PERSISTENT ADVERTISING

No more than you can eat enough in one day to last you a week, can a business man advertise enough in one week to last a year. The only time to stop advertising is after the store burns down. Even then some sort of advertising should be kept going in case the proprietor means to open up again. No little store can become a big store without advertising any more than a baby can grow up without milk. Perhaps there was a time when a storekeeper could build a retail business to a satisfactory size without printed advertising, but it was possible even then only to the few individuals who possessed highly developed business acumen and personal magnetism. In a community where personal acquaintanceship is productive of steady customers it sometimes happens that a merchant commands considerable trade on account of his personality. But the merchant who must appeal to the entire community upon the merits of his goods and the rightness of his prices can not hope to win success by standing on the sidewalk and buttonholing the passing public. A store must have dignity no less than the merchant must, and good advertising lends dignity to the advertiser. Big stores nowadays are advertising stores. Business men who hate advertising do not remain in business.—Eugene Guard.

FOREST FIRE CONTROL

Actions, not words, are necessary in handling the forest fire situation that is threatening the timbered lands of old Oregon. For that action, to a great extent, the state will depend upon the valiant efforts of the soldiers who have been dispatched to the forest wilds. But fire bugs are not alone responsible for the great loss.

Old man Carelessness has entered in for consideration again and the loss that the state will suffer because some of its honest and upright citizens have not taken the precautions that were necessary will run into millions of dollars.

The Courier does not wish anyone any unpleasantness, exactly, but it does wish that some of these joyous camping parties which forget to put water on camp fires and are careless about throwing away the remains of smoldering cigars, could be tied to a tree and permitted to enjoy to the fullest extent and at the closest safe range the delights of the mantle of smoke that comes from the fires they start.

Certainly these persons cannot plead ignorance, nor excuse themselves by the belief that they did not intend to do damage. Forest fires have taken a heavy toll in Oregon and no effort has been spared in any quarter to thoroughly educate the citizen to his duty while within timbered areas. There is no excuse for carelessness with camp fires.

The other fellow, the fiend who willfully and intentionally puts a torch to the brush—Civilization has no time for his ilk. The most expeditious manner of ridding the country of his breed of pestilence is none too prompt for the satisfaction of all concerned. The soldiers who have been sent into the woods with strict orders to fire without asking questions, and who have been given the proper weapons with which to obey such orders, furnish a fitting solution for the problem of incendiarism.

Oregon will not stop to ask the soldier who fires at a fire bug any more questions than the soldier may have asked before he fired. The fire bug is as much an enemy to our nation and our state as is the soldier in the trench and the war upon him should be prosecuted with equal vigor.

The person mean enough to set fire to a forest would make an excellent target for a firing squad to practice upon.

The theory that brains and hair cannot grow in the same head seems to be verified by the long-haired

How an Heiress Proposed to a Poor Man

By ELINOR MARSH

"Dick," said Helen Griswold to her friend and the family attorney, Richard Tarleton, whose office she had visited for consultation, "mother is very low. She is worrying about leaving me unprotected. The doctors say that her life hangs by a thread. If her mind could be got off this monomania about me she might recover. As it is there is little hope for her."

"Why don't you marry?"

"What! Marry all of a sudden; no one picked out by me; I picked out by no one!"

"How do you know no one has picked you out?"

"If any one has he has been very shy about showing it."

"I know a man who will marry you at once. He has loved you a long while."

"Why hasn't he told me?"

"There are many reasons to prevent a man's declaring his love. In the first place, few men are willing to do so unless they have met with some encouragement. In the second, a suitor may not consider himself able to support a wife in the manner."

"I have enough income to marry a beggar."

"But the beggar might not wish to be supported by a wife."

"True. Well, you are the family solicitor. It is your business to find me a husband."

"What has selecting a mate to do with law?"

"My case isn't selecting a mate; it's marriage, and marriage has a great deal to do with law."

"Right you are. Very well; I'll act for you. I understand you want a husband for the purpose of saving your mother's life. As soon as this object has been attained he is to be discarded."

"I didn't say that. If that were all I could tell mother that I was married without being married."

"But you wouldn't like to lie about it."

"Certainly not. Besides—"

"Besides what?"

"Are you going to take charge of this matter for me, or shall I get another lawyer?"

"I will find you a husband, but I can't answer for your accepting him."

"You can't be sure of that till you have offered him. If I can save mother I may decide to take a girl."

"I don't believe the man I have in mind would consent to wed you on that understanding."

"I may greatly prefer him to a girl when I see him. I tell you what you do. Give me a look at him without his knowing it."

"That's a good idea. Well, come here tomorrow morning."

"That's too late. If I am to save mother I must do it at once."

"Well, then, come here this afternoon at 5 o'clock. I will have my party here and a clergyman within call. If you accept him the wedding may take place at once."

At 5 o'clock Miss Griswold appeared at Mr. Tarleton's office. The door of his private room stood ajar, and the lady took a peep, for he remembered she was to have a look at the person she was to marry unknown to him. A man sat in an armchair looking out the window. She could not see his face nor much of his back. Whether she knew who was there is one of those things that don't enter into the telling of the story. She walked into the room, and the man sitting at the window, hearing her step, arose and faced her.

"The man of whom I spoke to you this morning—"

"Is perfectly satisfactory."

He started, looked happy, then confused, then doubtful, then continued: "This person has such doubts about his worthiness to possess you—as to you—"

"Did you not tell me that you would have him here at 5 o'clock?"

"I did."

"And you would arrange that I should have a look at him without his seeing me?"

"I said that too."

"Well, then what more remains?"

"Helen!"

"Dick!"

He stepped forward and took her in his arms. She sank into them as one tired out by an effort which had been repulsive to her. Presently she disengaged herself and said:

"I promised the doctor that I would break the news to mother this evening."

"But the clergyman. Since the person whom I intended—"

"Don't tell her," she said, covering his mouth with her hand.

"I can get one."

"Never mind. I have summoned one myself—our family pastor. He is to be at the house at 6. The doctor suggests that we be married at mother's bedside. He thinks that our doing so will act as a stimulant which may tide her over."

At 6 o'clock the announcement was made to Mrs. Griswold that her daughter was to marry at once the man whom the mother had always favored for a son-in-law, but who had been holding off because Helen was an heiress, while he was a struggling young lawyer. The wedding took place beside the invalid's bed, and the effect was what the doctors had anticipated. Mrs. Griswold began at once to improve and within a week was convalescent.

GIRLS BURY VICTIMS

Honor Guard Collects Nearly $100 for Funeral

A work that called big hearts into action was undertaken last Thursday by a group of members of the Girls' Honor guard, who volunteered to pay the funeral expenses of Mrs. Florence Smith and Minnie Sandy, victims of the triple drowning on Wednesday in the Tualatin river. The two women were sisters and, because of the sudden disappearance of Mr. Smith, were left penniless. Smith is said to have disappeared when he learned that his name was on the draft list, although it appears far down on the list.

The Honor guard collected nearly $100 about town and, taking the matter up with the city, secured two lots in Mountain View cemetery for the burial. Funeral services were held from the Holman parlors at 1:30 Friday afternoon and were conducted by readers from the Apostolic Faith church. Mrs. Clemmie Fairhurst, drowned at the same time, was buried near her companions.

With scores attending the services at the Holman chapel, victims of the triple drowning were buried at Mountain View cemetery. The Rev. Ray Crawford, of the Apostolic Faith church, conducted the services at the chapel, and the Rev. Florence Crawford presided at the graves. A cortege of 40 automobiles, bearing friends and strangers, followed the three hearse that carried the drowned women to their last resting place. Pallbearers were C. M. Young, J. A. Butler, G. Green, P. K. Miller, James Nichols and C. A. Colson.

FOOD SUPPLIES ON FARMS

Bureau of Crop Estimates Will Handle Farm End of Inventory

Determining by a country-wide canvass the approximate amount of important farm products on farms of the United States that is food or convertible into food, is the part the Bureau of crop estimates of the United States department of agriculture will take in the national food survey authorized by thirty-five thousand picked volunteers from its corps of 150,000 crop correspondents will be asked to take part in the farm survey.

Each of the field representatives, a farmer himself and thoroughly familiar with farm conditions in his community, will make a report of food stocks, including meat animals and crops on his farm and each of these representatives will be supplied with 10 extra schedules of inquiry which he will distribute among his neighbors, for reports upon their respective farms. From the 385,000 reports thus obtained, the experts of the bureau, knowing the total number of farms in the United States, will make final estimates for the farms of the country. It is believed that this estimate, judging from the accuracy of other records similarly gathered, will be within a few per cent of actual farm food stocks.

The farm survey will begin at once. A second survey about November 1, similarly conducted, will cover the fall harvests.

The bureau also will extend its regular crop estimates to crops not reported heretofore and further enlarge its service by special inquiries calculated to gather information arising from extraordinary farm conditions in certain sections.

FRANK MOUNT MARRIED

Popular Medic Takes New York Girl as Bride

While Oregon City friends were hearing of the engagement of Dr. Frank Mount to Miss Evelyn Weeks of New York City, the popular medic was quietly enjoying married life, according to news which came to the city yesterday. Dr. Mount and Miss Weeks were married at the home of the doctor's parents at Olympia, Wash., on Friday.

Dr. Mount is a son of Judge and Mrs. Wallace Mount of Olympia, Wash., and has been practicing his profession in this city for several years. He has been prominent in many phases of activity and recently has been in charge of instruction of the Girls' Honor Guard. Mrs. Mount is the daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Weeks of New York City and is a talented young woman. She came west recently with her parents to visit friends and it was while the family were guests at the home of Dr. and Mrs. Hugh Mount of this city that the engagement was announced. Dr. Mount is a lieutenant in the medical reserve corps stationed at American Lake, and after a brief rest will report back for duty. Lieutenant and Mrs. Mount will take quarters at the Tacoma country club while the doctor is on duty at American Lake.

Sale of Siletz Timber Reserve

The secretary of the interior has approved regulations for the sale at the United States land office, Portland, beginning at 10 o'clock a. m., on September 25, of the five sections of timber lands which were reserved by treaty with the Siletz Indians. These lands were cruised by a government cruiser, who estimated the amount of timber thereon, making allowance for defective timber. The cruiser found 170,620 M feet, distributed as follows: Douglas fir, 102,850 M feet; spruce, 13,060 M feet; hemlock, 28,350 M feet; cedar, 19,010 M feet; sapling hemlock 800 M feet. For the purpose of sale, a minimum price was placed on the timber of $1 per M feet for fir and spruce and 50 cents per M feet for cedar and hemlock, and the minimum price of the land was fixed at $1.25 per acre. At said prices, the valuation of the timber to be offered for sale is $146,540, and of the land

Two Ask Divorces

Judge Campbell Thursday was asked to grant a decree divorcing Hazel D. and Herbert J. Furney, who were married at Vancouver, Wash., on April 9 of this year. Mrs. Furney charges her husband with habitual drunkenness and cruelty. She asks $100 attorney's fees and $50 monthly alimony.

Because he is a "shiftless, no-account individual," as her complaint says, Elnora Edgar Thursday filed suit for divorce from Thomas K. Edgar, to whom she was married on May 21, 1914. Mrs. Edgar declares that her husband refuses to work. The divorce action of H. S. and Christina Stafford was dismissed by Judge Campbell Thursday.
