CALLING US NAMES

Last week the Woodburn Independent remarked, among other things, that:

"With possibly the exception of that Portland suburb, Oregon City, Woodburn is the most prominent city between Portland and Salem and will make marked progress this year including the erection of a magnificent high school building."

It is not the quip of the Courier herewith to cast any reflection upon Woodburn's growth, progress and future hopes. The Courier will welcome the day when Woodburn becomes a real city, a center of culture and learning, and a community that will be famed throughout the length and breadth of the Willamette valley. For when that day comes the great valley in which we live will have come into its own, and will have fulfilled its destiny and become the home of a million or so people.

But why should the Woodburn Independent at this time vent its jealousy at more prosperous communities by referring to one of them as "that Portland suburb, Oregon City?" What did we ever do to Woodburn? Why should our identity be confused with that funny town down the Willamette, where political boozing and bubbling interferes with advancement, and where a grasping and foolish Chamber of Commerce does something new each day to make itself ridiculous? Why this shaft of hatred from Woodburn?

Oregon City is not a suburb of Portland. It enjoys better freight rates than Portland, it is differentiated from the metropolis by many lines of demarcation. It doesn't resemble Portland at least, and it isn't dependent on Portland more than on any other jobbing center. Oregon City has an identity of its own, a mission of its own, and a life of its own—and if Portland was to disappear overnight, Oregon City would hardly miss it.

It is true that some of our misguided citizens have said that we ought to be a Portland suburb, and that we ought to be a community of commuters. Maybe their vapors have reached Woodburn, and have made the Independent forget that Oregon City has a wonderful payroll, has bigger industries than has Portland, and that Oregon City mills are working right along, and aren't being burned down so that the insurance on them will refund to their owners losses that have been sustained.

The Woodburn Independent ought to inform itself somewhat more about Oregon City, the busy little city by the falls—or else it ought to tell us why it is angry, peeved, jealous and generally sore. We trust the witty editor of the Independent will do this, and not make any more such foolish statements in its otherwise admirable columns.

GOOD PUBLIC WORK

The Courier has received from State Forester F. A. Elliott his annual report for the year 1915, and also a large map of Oregon, showing its forested areas and their present condition.

We are all of us proud of the state's timbered resources, and most of us like to get out in the primeval wilds and commune with Nature under the high canopies of our evergreen wildernesses. But when it comes down to appreciating the work done by the state or national foresters, by the boards which have the control of our wooded areas, we are apt to shrug our shoulders and wonder whether we are getting value received for the money spent.

Yet there is probably no branch of the public service, either state or national, that is so far-reaching in its importance as the forestry work that is done year in and year out, and that receives scarcely any public mention. The 28th legislature appropriated $60,000 for forest work in Oregon, and at the end of 1915 there was a balance of more than half this sum, or $32,865.84 cents still on hand. Of the money expended, the greatest part went for field expenses—for actual forest work. Fires were fought and conquered, patrols were maintained, warning notices were posted, and a campaign of education was conducted. Parts of the forest area were re-seeded so that in time they might become re-forested; and other work was done to protect and continue the state's great mass of timber resource.

But little has been said in print about this work. In fact the average person knows only that we have forests of wonderful extent because the horizon is broken with green mountains. Once in awhile, when a fire in the timber becomes larger than usual, brief space is given in the papers to the news features of the ruin being wrought; but otherwise we forget our forests, and what they mean to the state. We forget that they conserve the rainfall, protect the watersheds of our streams, furnish a great share of the annual state revenue, and support a most wonderful business directly—the lumber business—and that indirectly the forests make our agricultural supremacy possible.

Details of the work of preserving the forests are to be found in Mr. Elliott's report, and the state's map shows in detail and with vivid distinctness, what this ceaseless work really means to Oregon. Mr. Elliott is to be congratulated on his effort in behalf of the public; and it is really a pity that there is not a more general interest in his department. Perhaps in time the real worth of the work will be more generally appreciated.

THIS IS THE TIME

This is the time of the year when we may expect rain, but when we probably won't get it. In spite of the proverb about April showers bringing May flowers, it is likely that if there is any more rain all the pretty little flowers will be drowned out. And then, we have had so much rain that the sky must be pretty nearly empty.

This is also the time of the year when ye ardent fisherman will get him a boat and a line and hike into the Willamette, there to catch lines from other boats, and to envy the man who draws in, after a royal battle, a perfectly good salmon. This is also the time of the year when the tired businessman will get up early Sunday morning, put on his old clothes, and go out and spend the Sabbath wading in a cold stream, hoping against hope that the fellow up above won't scare all the trout. This is the time of the year when men will talk of flies and spoons and reels and lines and leaders and hooks, and when the women-folk will be exasperated at the lack of interest in other topics. Only some of the women-folk will be just as bad.

This is also the time of the year when there will be a rush at the office of the county clerk and the district registrars, and when sober citizens will rave about the delay in getting registered, and will never think that the delay is all their fault, and that they had months before these last feverish hours in which to enroll themselves for the privilege of the ballot. (And this reminds us—register today; the books close on April 18, and time is passing fast away.)

This is also the time when throughout the land candidates will be chanting their siren songs and promising lower taxes, fewer commissions, public service, economy, efficiency, and a stern realization of the duty of public servants. It is the time of the year when strange men (who will be found to be seeking office) will stop women and children on the streets and make complimentary remarks and give away cute little cards. It is the season for hot air, for pledges, for slogans and for orations and speeches.

This is also the time of the year for spring house-cleaning, for washing the parlor curtains, for beating the dining room carpet, and for taking down the stove in the sitting room. It is the gladtime season of gardening, and of trying to make seeds come up and grow the way the catalogues said they would. It is the gladtime season of gardening, and of trying to make seeds come up and grow the way the catalogues said they would. It is the time of the year when Cytheria will begin preening herself for the Easter parade, and when Willie will be trying on low shoes and buying loud socks. It is the time of the year for moonlight walks, and for drives on Sunday, and for girls to tell their dearest friends that they are going to be married in June. In short it is April, and spring-time has really arrived.

JUST THINK OF IT

"When the Mayflower landed at Plymouth Rock its pious travelers carrying their bottle of booze ashore with their household effects, ran afoul of a husky, warlike, red race of teetotallers. How long did the water-drinkers keep their land from the Pilgrims, whose descendants were the guys who put the "make" in Jamaica rum, and who at last accounts were still able to match muscles or wits with any total abstainers whatever, at a ratio of about five to one?"

Thus, in part, does the Baltimore Evening Sun argue that races that drink booze are more powerful and successful than races that do not drink booze.

Well, we are not going to argue here the question as to whether booze is good or bad, but if we were to be asked to take up and uphold the "wet" side of the argument, we'd go awfully soft on the matter of Indians and the Pilgrims. In fact if we were talking about the merits of booze, we wouldn't say a word at all about the noble red men who once proudly stalked over this land from the sun-kissed waters of the Atlantic to the fire-clad slopes of the Pacific. The less said about Indians when booze under one executive head. The only feature of Mr. Roots' appointment that could be criticized is that it was delayed so long. The road affairs of the county should have been put under control earlier, before any money was expended for the year.

The appointment of a competent roadmaster will be bound to give results. Work will be systematized and unified, effort will be concentrated in one line; and there will be an end to the "57 varieties" of road tinkering that have for so long held back the hearty co-operation of the road supervisors, and that under his direction whatever work that is now done will be well done. At any rate, if results do not follow, we shall know where to put the blame.

April is a short month—but the time to register is shorter still. April 18 is the last day.

Life is indeed dull. Down in Portland, for excitement, they are once again betting when the war will end. They did that last spring, too.

Oregon City's credit seems to be pretty good after all. At least local banks show confidence in it—enough to absorb the bond issue at home.

Mr. Willard beat up Mr. Moran and as a result got several thousand dollars. Yet many another man who has done a similar job has got 30 days in jail.

Cummins will get the German-American vote, the republicans are hopefully announcing. All of which States to use a Mexican railroad "purely on a commercial basis." That's nice of him—and he didn't try to run any bluff about a shortage of cars, either.

"Satan Hard Hit by Methodist Revival" says a headline in the Enterprise. Not enjoying an intimate acquaintance with His Majesty as does our contemporary, we are unable to either confirm or deny this report.

Somebody remarked that a prisoner arraigned in justice court recently needed a haircut. "Don't worry, his attorney will trim him close enough," commented a bystander. That is what we call a cruel thrust.

The Clackamas Heights man who was arrested for bootlegging told the officers when he paid his fine that he harbored no ill will against them. And the officers said they'd just as leave arrest him again as not, too.

THINK ABOUT THIS

Rev. W. T. Milliken Propounds Questions Not Easily Answered

Editor, Courier: In the remarks I am about to inflict upon a long-suffering public I have no intention of criticizing the attitude of our city council towards minors who offend against the law. They can do no different without themselves being offenders. Neither do I criticize the men who are running our pool-rooms. I think they are doing the best they can, and they have troubles of their own. But I am anxious to work out a logical philosophy regarding the ancient and honorable institution of pool, and hope that some compassionate individual of a logical turn will help me out by is under discussion, the better—for booze.

It is not to be denied that the Pilgrims liked their liquor, or that Jamaica rum was soon outdistanced by Medford rum, made within a day's hike of the place whereat landed the Pilgrims and other early day reformers. Nor is it to be denied that the men who made early American history could drink, and did drink, more than enough to give a modern day patriot delirium tremens—but why compare their record with that of the Indians?

Why mention Indians at all in a pro-booze argument? It strikes us, viewing it from afar, and with a somewhat intimate knowledge of the effect of fire water on the noble red man, that the anti-prohibition philosopher who was responsible for that fine outburst in the Baltimore Evening Sun let his foot slip very, very badly when he mentioned the subject of Indians in his discussion of what booze has done for the human race.

LATE, BUT GOOD

The appointment of T. A. Roots as roadmaster of the county, announced last week by the county court, is a good move, and should receive the endorsement of every citizen of the county. Mr. Roots appears to be a road-builder of more than usual competence, and it is high time that the road problem in Clackamas county had the benefit of direct control may be true—but that isn't a majority.

The was is still going on in Europe. We mention this here so you won't forget it, even if the war has been crowded off the front pages of the dailies.

Nearly a week of April has gone by—and yet some people haven't registered. Of course you're not one of these folks. Registration books close April 18.

Don't do today what you can put off until tomorrow, seems to be the motto of some folk. But if you don't register before April 18, you'll find April 19 is too late.

As has been before remarked, the movement for good roads in this county has now taken Roots. Now for trunk highways and later some good branches.

In olden days the small boy with the bent pin and the worm may have caught fish—but he wasn't after salmon. It takes more than a pin to hold a salmon.

The "back to the soil" movement isn't dead. Just think of those men and women camping outside the Portland land office, so they can get a bit of earth for their very own.

answering all my questions, without getting cross-eyed, or tying up his wits in a double bow knot.

1. Is it the game that's wrong? Then why do they allow it in Y. M. C. A.'s, Church Guild Halls, Commercial Club rooms, Lodge Rooms, etc.?

2. Why is it a sin and a crime, punishable by fine or imprisonment, for a youth to play pool the day before he is twenty-one, and such a highly religious act after he is twenty-one that our erudite city dads hold up their hands in holy horror at the narrowness of the bigots who would close the doors of the poolrooms to him on Sunday?

3. If it is such a bad place that the boy is fined for going near it on Saturday, is it such a good place that it must be kept open for his dad on Sunday?

4. Or why should we not put the man over twenty-one in jail for playing pool as well as the boy under 21?

5. Or is the pool room all right, the boy's crime being merely the unpardonable one of being under age? If so, why not put all who are guilty of being minors into jail until they promise to do better?

6. Or are there two standards of morality—one for the man over twenty-one and one for the boy under that age?

7. Or is it the pool hall and its associations that are bad?

8. I think our pool room men are trying to run good places. Why do they not seem to succeed?
