Surely if buyers were ever offered inducements to trade at home those offers are presented on the advertising pages of The Courier today by the merchants of Oregon City. Such genuine values are not offered in the larger cities and wise purchasers will take advantage of every opportunity offered to save money.

Huntley Bros., have a novel three-day sale which is to attract wide attention. It is a "One Cent sale." Buy an article at Huntley's for the regular price and get another just like it for one cent. Attractive, isn't it?

The C. C. Store announces today a two-week mill and factory sale that has had no equal in many months. For wearables for the entire family the C. C. Store seems to be the center of interest just now. The values are genuine and the goods are the best.

George W. Buck & Co., continue their bargain sale of household furnishings and in their advertisement lists many startlingly low values in furniture and household equipment. Housewives will appreciate the bargains offered.

Frank Busch has answered the call of spring in his advertising this week. Improvements about the house demand a certain amount of new building materials. Doors in many styles are the special offering presented this week.

Larsen & Co., continue to point out the advantages of their plan of paying cash for farm products. Farmers will find at the Larsen store a wide variety of daily household needs, including groceries and other supplies.

Mitchell-Lewis & Staver have on the market a very popular ensilage cutter—the Blizzard. Farmers appreciate the value of ensilage and know that a good investment is an ensilage cutter, whereby crops are often saved from total loss.

Jones Drug Co. Those who do their own painting and enameling often find that enamel will not stay clean in spite of all efforts. The Jones Drug company sells Acme quality enamels, warranted to stay clean, and sells them at popular prices.

The new Sharples cream separator is on sale at Wilson & Cooke's big store. The new Sharples is said to be the only separator on the market with a suction feed, and is noted especially for the saving of cream. Its operation will be gladly explained.

EXPERT ON VALUES OUT FOR ASSESSOR

R. E. Woodward, republican candidate for nomination to the County Assessor's office and seeking the office under qualifications that make him an exceptionally good person for the place, is a man of wide experience in the real estate business. In asking for the support of the republican voters of the county Mr. Woodward calls special attention to his qualifications and to his thorough knowledge of land and property values, especially as they are found in Clackamas county.

During the greater part of his life Mr. Woodward has lived in this county and is very favorably known to the majority of the voters. He has a circle of friends in the county and state that includes practically every acquaintance he has made in the time he has been in business in the county. His special ability for the assessorship comes from years of connection with the real estate business. He has actually been over the ground and has gained a first-hand knowledge of values that is perhaps not enjoyed by any other person in the county.

A square deal to every taxpayer, is the slogan of Mr. Woodward's campaign. He promises to show no favoritism in assessments or otherwise if he is elected and he will endeavor to conduct his office along the most economical lines. He pledges himself to render a strict accounting to the taxpayers for all expenses incurred in the office.

He says that he will feel highly honored if the voters give him their support, and will do his utmost in return to repay them for their confidence. With a fair and impartial assessment of the county he believes that the total tax income will be materially increased without placing an extra burden upon the small taxpayer. (Paid Adv.)

"Win with Wilson" was a slogan of hope in 1912. In 1916 it is a slogan of security.

BARBAROUS MEXICO

Former Resident of Mexico Expresses His Views

There are many things wrong with Mexico, a nation over-ridden with the burdens of foreign capital, handicapped by a lack of educational facilities and, therefore, borne down to poverty and pestilence by the weight of ignorance in a population very largely illiterate.

But the wrongs of Mexico are not entirely of her own creation. The same old story has been hashed over a thousand times since the fall of the statesman, Porfirio Diaz, and the rise of those so unworthy, compared intellectually. But the blame has too infrequently rested where it should.

First of all, American and British capital are largely at fault for the evil conditions of our sister republic. And next in volume of blame is the prolific imagination of American and European tourist-writers. A few years ago Turner, published in a well-known magazine, and later in book form, his scandalous fantasy "Barbarous Mexico." Fundamentally a few of Turner's statements contained a rudiment of truth, but the great mass of his large volume was fiction of the most fabricated variety. Turner and his ilk have been a curse to pest-ridden Mexico for many decades, although this particular character perhaps invented more lies than all the rest combined.

Porfirio Diaz, whom Hubert Howe Bancroft, the noted historian, has characterized as the "most autocratic ruler in Christendom," was successful in warding off the blows of such fictionists as Turner, because he was such an iron-fisted ruler and such a noble character that the attention of invading writers was usually diverted to the ruler rather than the ruled. But Mexico and her people sinned. They banished Diaz from the presidential chair, where he had been a power in world affairs for more than thirty years, and they banished him from the country of his birth and the land that was becoming prolific under the rule of the "autocrat."

It was a few years before the fall of Diaz that Turner, a moneyed tourist, made the usual tourist-writer's trip through Mexico. He pictured an indescribable crime and wantonness. He wrote of slavery and blasted the country to kingdom come in many ways. Turner's opinion in itself did not amount to the paper it was written on, and his most severe criticism came from the American residents in Mexico who were on the spot and knew a thousand times more about conditions than a dozen Turners ever dreamed, but his opinion and his fiction, written as facts, was published widely and readers throughout the land immediately jumped at his statements as being the whole truth.

Turner, at best, spent but a few weeks in Mexico with his camera and note book, but the result of his fictitious and malicious statements hangs over Mexico to this day. To people familiar with the country and its inhabitants, the talk of those who do not know more about it than what such men as Turner have written, is hugely amusing, and many times actually disgusting. The Mexican people are not so illiterate and uncivilized as to be unable to care for themselves, but Turner and those of his money-making school would have us believe that it is a nation overrun with bandits, skulking about the dark woods waiting for an American; a nation of abject slavery, both moral and physical. The likes of Turner did a great deal to create hate against Mexico in American hearts, and his accomplishments were entirely those of falsehood and fabrication, for the sake of the profits on his publications. That class can take much of the responsibility for the dimming of the light of Porfirio Diaz, one of the greatest statesmen the world has ever known, and a man whose whole heart and soul was plunged into the welfare of the country he had done so much for.

The money of American and European masters has been responsible to a large extent, for the illiteracy that exists in Mexico. Money masters found that they could make Mexican labor feed out of their hands, and they never allowed the under dog to rise from his pitiful state. It was through the efforts of Diaz that the under dogs made what progress they did, and it was because of this that American and European capital, notably the Guggenheim corporation, controlling the American Smelting & Refining company and operating hundreds of mines and a score of smelters in Mexico, and the Standard Oil interests, that Diaz was successfully banished from the country after the first revolution some five years ago.

When the poverty-stricken Mexican laboring class, the lowly peon, first came under the spell of such power as that of the Guggenheim outfit, the common daily wage scale was a measure of corn, and perhaps a pair of evil smelling shoes as a monthly bonus for good service. What corn could be sold from the measure bought the few other necessities of meager lives, and it sometimes even happened that the corporation would pay good men ten or twelve cents a day in addition to their measure of corn. But under the "autocratic" rule of the noble statesman, Porfirio Diaz, the wage scale gradually ascended, until, just before the outbreak of the revolution against his rule five years ago, the Guggenheim interests were paying their labor from fifty to seventy-five cents a day, Mexican money, which was then about half the value of the American money, but many times the value of a measure of corn.

A nation sinned when it banished Porfirio Diaz. But a nation never regretted its sin or prayed for deliverance from the penalty of sin like Mexico did when she discovered her mistake. When Diaz died in Paris some few weeks ago, a heart-broken and aged shadow of his former self, a nation mourned. And with it mourned a man, those who knew Mexico under the Diaz regime; who knew the works of the man and the ambitions of his life.

THE TRAMP'S SIDE OF IT

He Laments the Wickedness of the World
By M. QUAD
Copyright, 1916, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.

"Oh, yes; I see a good deal of human nature as I travel about," replied the tramp as he put his wet shoes against the hot stove, "and the more I see of it the more I wish I was a hermit in a cave up in the mountains."

"Do you find it growing worse?" was asked.

"Preachers tell us that the world is growing better," continued Willie. "but if one day's travel in the country wouldn't prove to the contrary I'd give my old hat. I began touring sixteen years ago, and I give you my word that there is at least twice the wickedness now that there was then, and it is growing mightier fast. Yes; I'll give you some illustrations."

"I meet so many liars that I have come to believe that not one man in a hundred has any respect for truth. I get two or three days' work with a farmer. After the day's work is done the family looks for me to sit down and relate my adventures. They encourage me to lie. They want me to tell about the robberies and thefts I have committed and the prisons I have been in and escaped from. If I don't lie outrageously they think I am a villain who will not give himself away; if I do lie the chances are that they will arrest me for the crimes I have confessed."

"I have heard husbands lie to wives and wives to husbands. I have, in fact, heard so much lying as to disgust me, and I am only a tramp. There are hypocrisy and deceit everywhere. There are swindling and graft everywhere. A country constable who arrests me on the highway as I am plodding along will swear before the justice of the peace that I was just entering or leaving a farmer's barn. The owner of that barn can be induced to go into court and perjure himself, and the justice who tries me will remark that I look like a murderer."

"I very seldom ever heard one family speak well of another in the country, but when they met they were always very effusive. One afternoon a farmer's wife had me in the house scrubbing floors and washing windows and moving furniture about. In three hours' time she blasted the character of every family for five miles around. She had just finished her trade when a woman that she had accused most bitterly happened to drop in. That accuser rushed for her with open arms and kissed her half a dozen times before she stopped."

"I have read and heard about savagery of war—the submarines, the poisonous gases, the starvation of prisoners—but let me tell you that there is savagery elsewhere than in war. Man was born a savage."

"Let me give you an incident. I was plodding along the highway one summer morning about half-past 8 o'clock. I passed a country schoolhouse. Thirty rods beyond the house I met the schoolmarm on her way to open school. I had not quite forgotten the manners of other days, and I raised my cap and bade her a good morning. She passed on without a word in reply, and a short quarter of a mile beyond I met three children going to school. I gave them a smile and a word, and they laughed in reply. That was the whole thing, sir—the whole thing. I knew that the children stopped and looked after me, but I stepped along without turning my head."

"At a farmhouse a mile further on I got work hoeing corn. I worked so hard during the day that the farmer complimented me at night, and I heard his wife whisper to him that they had found a tramp at last who seemed willing to sweat a little to earn his way. I was to sleep in the barn, and soon after 9 o'clock and when I was getting ready to go out to my room they arrived at the house, headed by the schoolmarm, a gang of five or six farmers. Three among them had guns, two had clubs, and one had a coil of rope in his hand."

"There is the villain—that's the man!" exclaimed the woman as she caught sight of me.

"What is the trouble?" I asked.

"You ran after me this morning," she cried. "You would have caught hold of me if I had not picked up a stone and threatened to throw it in your face!"

"Well, that was a nice fix I was in," said the tramp. "Nothing of the kind had taken place, and for a minute I was dumb with surprise. Then I denied it, but it was no go."

"In a moment or two more something would have happened to me if I had not thought of the three children I met. I asked that some one might go for them, and my employer was good enough to hasten on that errand. He said that I should have a fair show. The children and their father came, and it put a different light on the story at once. When the young woman was asked why she told such a yarn, which might have brought about the death of a man, she carelessly replied:

"Oh, I was so scared that I really don't know just what did happen."

"My employer said to me: 'You are an innocent man, but a marked man. You will have to go. You can't stay in this neighborhood.'"

"And Willie Willie moved on," was the conclusion of the story. "He was threatened with lynchings because he had raised his cap and given good cheer to a woman on the highway! Don't say we have returned to savagery. Say, rather, we have never lost it!"

The best interests of his country, viewed in a broad and very wise manner, and the best interests of his people, were always uppermost in the mind of the banished statesman. How different from the money-grabbing, back-biting, devil-be-damned ambitions of those who have followed him. How different from the selfish, evil-intentioned Huerta, Carranza, and Villa was the statesman, the "autocratic" Porfirio Diaz.

MRS. "BOB" LECTURES

Wife of Former Puglist Visits Local Baptist Church

Mrs. Bob Fitzsimmons, who for the past 20 years has been engaged as an operatic singer, appeared before a large crowd in Oregon City Tuesday night. It was not in the role of an actress that she appeared, however, but in that of an evangelist.

Recently Mrs. Fitzsimmons, now separated from her famous ex-puglist husband, became ill and was taken to a hospital in Los Angeles. Despondent and disgusted with life, Mrs. Fitzsimmons attempted to commit suicide. The attempt proved futile, due to interference of a nurse. Religious workers passing through the hospital left the famous woman a Bible. Through reading the Bible, and through the work of the religious politician, also addressed the Live Wires. Mr. Moores, formerly a resident of this city, where he was for several years registrar of the land office, was introduced by Judge Grant B. Dimick. The speaker recalled his pleasant associations in this community. Mr. Moores has many friends in this city and county. He was located here from 1897 until 1904, and many of the then prominent residents were out to greet the visitor.

A committee delegated by the Woman's club of Oregon City presented to the club a report on the club's progress in establishing a resort for workmen in this city, and asked for the moral and financial support of the club. A committee of three members, Willard P. Hawley, Jr., A. R. Jacobs and George A. Harding, was appointed by Main Trunk Howland to arrange for the support of the Live Wires in creating and maintaining the proposed resort.

OLSON WAS ALARMED

Young Man Claims Terrible Experience with Woman

While sitting alone at his desk in the Andersen building last evening, J. D. Olson, enterprising journalist, was attacked by a wild woman. At least, Olson says he was.

The woman, who escaped before she could be arrested, and whose name is not known to the officials, burst into the office, armed to the teeth. She carried a butcher knife, as well as a "heavy club, and Olson only escaped after dashing through the halls of the Andersen and Beaver buildings. Olson then took the passenger elevator to the 12th floor, then walked to the basement, and, after being in hiding for over an hour, came back to his office, which was then deserted. All this according to the young man's own frenzied narrative.

"The sheriff and the police were notified and are searching for the intruder," says Olson. She is described as a wild-eyed monster, but Olson could give no further description, as he did not stop to take a good look at her.

Friends who have heard the story of this awful daylight experience are either taking it as imagination with a grain of salt, or with remorse for Olson's fall from the prohibitory water wagon.

STARKWEATHER NAMED

Democratic Central Committee Holds Quiet Session

Aside from the acceptance of the resignation of E. T. Mass as chairman of the Democratic County Central Committee and the election of Harvey G. Starkweather of Concord to fill the vacancy, very little business was transacted at the meeting of the committee held at Knapp's hall here last Saturday.

The meeting was well attended by democratic voters from all sections of the county and after some interesting though unimportant political discussion plans were made for holding a committee banquet in Oregon City some time soon after the primary election. At the proposed banquet democratic voters will be given an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the party candidates for election this fall. The plans for the banquet are tentative as yet and no date has been set for the event.

NET FISHERMEN MAY LOSE THEIR RIGHT

The net fishermen usually get busy about the time the best run of salmon starts up the river and their heavy inroads make rod and line fishing a joke. If nets were kept off the river the rod and line men, who greatly outnumber the net men in any event, would have better fishing and could fish through a much longer season, bringing more money to Clackamas county, more fame to the community and more people.

There are a number of real sportsmen who make their home in Oregon City throughout the year for absolutely no other purpose than to get an advantage over outsiders when the rod and line fishing starts in the spring. The majority of local people take part in rod and line fishing and the few local net fishermen are in very small numbers.

Therefore, a question that vitally concerns Clackamas county, and, in fact, all Oregon, is whether or not the rod and line sportsmen are more desirable than net fishermen. The question will, no doubt, find its proper solution at the next session of the state legislature, and the hope has been pretty generally expressed that the dead line for net fishermen be extended at that time to the mouth of the Willamette.

M. J. BROWN

FORMER EDITOR OF THE COURIER

Says

To whom concerned:

I have known Maxwell Victor for a number of years; he was employed by me on the Oregon City Courier, and I found him a man of rare discernment and much ability, especially along the lines of unearthing political corruption and digging up details of crime. He has a wide knowledge of humanity and is equal to any occasion that arises. In his office work I have found him strictly honest and efficient, and I can recommend him to anyone requiring the services of a diligent, skilled and experienced worker; both on a newspaper AND FOR THE PUBLIC GOOD.

(Signed) M. J. BROWN.

That's what Brown thinks.

The county seat ring doesn't want me.

How about you, Mr. Voter?

WHAT ONE CENT WILL DO

The despised one cent piece usually considered of so little value that it is given to the children or dropped into a penny slot machine or gotten rid of in some way, will be given a purchasing value of 25c, 50c and even $1.00 or more at Huntley Bros. Co. on next Saturday, Monday and Tuesday.

At that time you can buy for 1c a $1.75 Fountain Syringe. For 1c you can buy a 40c box of Stationery or a 50c jar of Cold Cream or a $1.00 bottle of Wine of Cod Liver Oil.

At Huntley's big 1c sale it will buy a 25c tube of Tooth Paste or a 35c Tooth Brush or a 50c box of Toilet Powder or a 50c bottle of Hair Tonic or a 40c book, or your choice of over 100 different everyday needed articles ranging in value from 5c to $2.00.

Plan Mulino School Fair

Arrangements are being made for a school fair to be held at Mulino sometime this month. The fair will be under the direction of Miss Flora Gryce and will be an all-day event characterized by an elaborate program. Miss Gryce will announce the details of her plans in the near future.

Military Ball

In commemoration of the ninth anniversary of its organization, Company G. O. N. G. is to be host at a military ball at the armory in this city on Saturday evening. Elaborate preparations are being made for the affair and a keen interest is being taken by the young men of the company. Socially the event will occupy a conspicuous place on the spring calendar.

Prosperity is a powerful antidote for the poison of partisan politics, and for that reason our republican friends are finding it exceedingly difficult to arouse the voters to take an interest in the result of the Chicago convention. The hand-picked delegates may select any one of a dozen of the Old Guard, the rough riders may stampede the whole outfit for T. R., or maybe the g. o. p. will swap the elephant for a fiver f. o. b. Detroit. It makes little difference to the busy business man who has already nominated his own candidate—Woodrow Wilson.

Californian to Preach Here

The Rev. John O. Wahlberg from Pasadena, Calif., will preach in the Methodist church in Oregon City next Sunday, May 14, at 3 o'clock p. m. All Scandinavians have been cordially invited to attend.

Dr. Allan Hoben of Chicago says: "When you lean up against a post and stutter, 'My last bun' then you're through. You're an old man." That reminds us that a great many men suddenly became old in Oregon about midnight, December 31, 1915. Light promotes cleanliness.
